Leeds and His Wives

The domestic affairs of W. B. Leeds continue to occupy the attention of Sunday supp writers, who appear to be mostly interested in the rivalry between Mrs. Leeds No. 1 and Mrs. Leeds No. 2, which reached a white heat at a winter resort in Florida, when the two women tried to excite each other's envy by means of gorgeous frocks and costly gems. Very little has been said of the incidents leading up to the spectacular duel or of the man who was responsible for it, and yet both the man and his career possess considerable dramatic interest. He is president of the great Rock Island railroad system and he is a multi-millionaire who is recognized as a great power in industry and finance. His first start in life was given him by his wife, a Miss Gar of Richmond, Ind., who possessed some means and rare physical charms. With her money he went to the top in the tin plate business, and a little later became a railroad magnate. His domestic life appeared to be a happy one until a few months ago when his wife sued for a divorce. The suit created a great sensation because it leaked out that Leeds gave his wife one million dollars to apply for the decree, and that he was in love with another woman. The object of his affections was encumbered by a husband and she, too, applied for a divorce so that she would be free to marry Leeds. She was Mrs. Nannie May Stewart Washington, wife of George E. Washington of Cleveland, Ohio. This suit was bitterly contested, and cost Leeds a lot of money, for he was backing the fair plaintiff. The wedding that followed was a gorgeous affair and it has been estimated that the wedding and the honeymoon cost at least two million dollars. Among Mr. Leeds's costly gifts to his wife was a string of pearls said to be worth eighty thousand dollars. Now it is said that Mrs. Leeds No. 1 is to marry again.

"I know she's ugly, my boy, but don't let that worry you; ugliness is only skin deep."

"That may be so, but how do I know she'll shed her skin?"

She Knew

I heard an amusing story the other day about Dr. Genthe, the photographer, who recently returned from Moki-land, and who loves to thrill society belles with tales of hairbreadth escapes. Genthe was imported from Germany by Baron von Schroeder to become the tutor of the nobleman's sons. Some time ago a society matron who had been abroad several years was surprised to learn that the photographer had the entree to her set.

"Is it possible," she asked one of her friends, "that you allow him to call on you? When I was in San Rafael some years ago he was Von Schroeder's coachman."

"Impossible!" exclaimed her friend.

"Oh, no, I am quite positive, because I distinctly remember hearing the Baron say what an excellent 'coach' he was."

Her Misfortune

Though Mrs. Julius Kahn is a charming and talented woman, she has the misfortune to be related to people of prominence into whose identity her own is merged. Not long ago when she was at a reception the hostess, in introducing her to one of the guests, said:

"This is the wife of Congressman Julius Kahn."

A little later, she introduced Mrs. Kahn to somebody else as "the daughter of Mrs. Mary Prag," the well-known Girls' High School teacher. With a pout, Mrs. Kahn observed:

"I wish somebody cared to know me for my own sake. I'm always being introduced as my husband's wife or my mother's daughter."

Colonel and Mrs. Isaac Trumbo, who have been in Salt Lake City for some weeks past, are expected home soon. They are visiting the Edward McGurrins.

Ramsay was a Jagster

Stanford has lost another professor, but not because of his indiscreet volubility. Professor W. M. Ramsay, who was arrested in San Jose for insanity and discharged, was connected with the Spanish department at Stanford. He resigned on the first of the month, and the report among the students was that he indulged his appetite for liquor too much. So when he was arrested for insanity they knew that he was merely suffering from the effects of a jag. Ramsay came to this coast from Columbia College two years ago, and it was said that he had a big reputation in academic circles, but not for his capacity to booze. However, from the very first the students were suspicious, for Ramsay frequently looked as though he had been fanning the flame of conviviality. Early in his career at Stanford he was called on for an explanation by Dr. Jordan, whose specialty is fishing and who is therefore familiar with the pocket flask and its harrowing effects. Professor Ramsay explained that he took whisky as a medicine, it having been prescribed by a physician for a nervous disorder. On the strength of this explanation he managed to hold his job for two years, but of late the nervous attacks followed in such quick succession that the unfortunate professor had to increase his doses, much to the amusement of the students. Their comments finally reached the ears of Dr. Jordan, and Ramsay's resignation was at length demanded.

In Restraint of Flirtation

When Stanford University opened last month the students were surprised to learn of some new rules that had been formulated by Dr. Jordan. They were rules for the regulation of the social intercourse of the young men and young women of the university, and now I hear that President Jordan, believing them not to be sufficiently stringent, has enacted a few more in which he prescribes the maximum time that a pair may consume in driving, and fixes the time that they may occupy together walking in the moonlight. These rules are regarded as significant by the opponents of co-education at the university. At the opening of the semester it was announced that in future men and women would not be permitted to room on the same floor of any of the many campus boarding-houses, or to occupy a boarding-house in which there was no parlor. This announcement occasioned some surprise, but not half so much as the report that the matrons of Roble and Madrona halls are to be instructed to prohibit the girls in their charge from spending more than half a day in the company of a young man, either driving or walking; also that the girls will be denied the privilege of strolling with escorts in the moonlight after eight o'clock.

Mrs. Tower's Portrait

There is an excellent portrait of Mrs. Charlemagne Tower in the current issue of the National Magazine of Boston. Mrs. Tower, who was Nellie Smith of Oakland, is the wife of the American Ambassador at the German court, and she returns to her own country after scoring many social triumphs abroad. Mr. Tower was first stationed at St. Petersburg, where he and his wife gained many friends. Mrs. Tower is a woman of rare charm, not absolutely beautiful in feature but with faultless taste in dress and a manner in which dignity is combined with simplicity and sincere cordiality. It is said that the social attentions heaped upon the Towers during the late season in Berlin were largely the result of the German Emperor's efforts to cement the friendly relations existing between the Empire and the Republic.

The Return of the Native

The return of Miss Bessie Bowie, worn and wan by her untiring efforts to make a big voice out of a small one by the aid of Parisian voice culturists, should be an object lesson to other ambitious students whom Miss Lillie Lawler's failure failed to convince. Miss Bowie is a very talented young woman and she had boundless energy and courage when she started out, but she has returned home a mere shadow, say her friends, of what she was. As soon as her health permits, and it is really rest she needs more than anything else, she will open a studio for teaching. She has a faultless method, and the talent to impart what she has learned, and she should therefore make a success. I always insisted that Miss Lawlor would be a splendid teacher, for her diction and method are perfect, but Miss Lawlor's plans did not include a music studio in San Francisco.

The Woman That's Good

Harold Richard Vynne, the newspaperman who was committed to an insane asylum in Chicago last week, was a victim of the temptations that beset the primrose path. He was a brilliant journalist and has many friends in the local newspaper fraternity. Three years ago he published a novel that photographed incidents in his own life, and the heroine of it was his wife, the daughter of a New York newspaper publisher. It was called "The Woman That's Good—a Story of the Undoing of a Dreamer," and in it he related how a newspaper man was wooed away from his good wife by the subtle influence of Manhattans, Martinis and Phrynes. It was in this novel that he introduced a beautiful toast, which has been quoted at many a social gathering since. These are two of the stanzas:

Ho, gentlemen! lift your glasses up—
Each gallant, each swain and each lover—
A kiss to the beads that brim in the cup,
A laugh for the foam spilt over!
For the soul is a-lilt and the heart beats high,
And care has unloosed its tether;
"Now drink," said the sage, "for tomorrow we die!"
So, let's have a toast together.
Swing the goblet aloft; to the lips let it fall:
Then bend you the knee to address her;
And drink, gentle sir, to the Queen of us all—
To the Woman that's Good—God bless her.

Ah, Bohemia's honey was sweet to the sip,
And the song and the dance were alluring—
(The mischievous maid with the mutinous lip
Had a charm that was very enduring)—
But out from the music and smoke-wreaths and lace
Of that world of the tawdrily clever,
There floats the rare spell of the pure little face
That has chased away folly forever!
And I pledge my last toast ere I go to my rest—
O fortunate earth to possess her!
To the dear, tender heart in the little white breast
Of the Woman that's Good—God bless her!

The Clever Partingtons

The prettiest of the Partington sisters, Phyllis, made her debut in grand opera at the Tivoli on Monday night, and her modest success may well incite her to persevere in her chosen calling. She has plenty of temperament and a genuine love of music, with the patience to apply herself to study and practice before attempting the larger roles. She is a charming, brown-eyed girl of the Gibson type. The Partington sisters are all clever. Gertrude lately returned from Paris where she had a picture accepted for the Salon. It was she who made the California Girl in her beauty and variety known in the East and Europe, through the medium of an artistic calendar a few years ago. Blanche Partington is the Call's music and dramatic critic. They are English girls but have lived such a long while in San Francisco that they seem like natives.

The Hearsts Are Here

Mr. and Mrs. William R. Hearst came to town early this week and have been spending most of the time since their arrival at the Hacienda del Poso de Verona, the suburban home of Mrs. Phoebe Hearst at Pleasanton across the bay. The young Napoleon of journalism and his newly wedded wife came out to attend the wedding of Miss Anne Apperson, a cousin of Mr. Hearst. She was married to Dr. Marshall Flint of Berkeley at the Hearst hacienda last Tuesday. It was a very sumptuous and elaborate affair, and I was surprised that the Examiner devoted comparatively little space to the function. It is usual nowadays for the dailies to exploit in a most vulgar fashion the social achievements of the families of their publishers, and the Examiner was expected to spread the account of the Apperson-Flint wedding over at least two pages, with appropriate pictures and screeching headlines, but much to my amazement the story was confined to a single column, and the names of Mr. and Mrs. William Randolph Hearst were never mentioned, not even among the also-rans.

The Budd-Livernash Combine

During the early part of the week Mr. Hearst spent all his time at Pleasanton and never made his appearance in the Examiner editorial rooms. Whenever he is due to arrive there is usually a feeling of uneasiness in the office because invariably something drops after he departs. After his last visit, a few months ago, there was an awful hubbub in the office. Plans had been made to reorganize the local Democracy in his interest, and it was supposed that the Examiner would support the movement. But by the time Mr. Hearst reached New York it was learned that he had been prevailed upon to occupy neutral ground. The plans that had been made were completely upset, much to the disgust of Mr. Hearst's chief representatives in the Examiner office. They had been laboring under the delusion that they enjoyed his confidence whereas he was taking tips from Ex-Governor Budd who, though he owed allegiance to the reorganizers, was sore because he had not been taken into their councils and determined to wreck the movement. He entered into a combination with Congressman Livernash and together they successfully pursued the subterranean tactics of the mole and arranged a little political coup for their own aggrandizement. They figured out that by encouraging Michael Casey in the fight against Schmitz they could get control of the Labor Party and dictate terms to the Democracy.

Hearst's Neutrality

Hearst acquiesced in their plans even to the extent of sitting down with Boss McNab who had been hurling abuse at him for years, and agreeing to occupy neutral ground. It was agreed that when Casey won out the Labor and Democratic machines should come together and nominate a joint municipal ticket. But Casey was beaten, the Democracy was split wide open and strategic Budd has been traveling in Europe ever since. Meanwhile Mr. Hearst has been truly neutral. By way of demonstrating his neutrality he has divested the Examiner of all suspicion of yellow tints. The erstwhile slashing free-lance in the field of politics has become almost as insipid and fully as invertebrate as the Ladies' Home Journal. By way of demonstrating his neutrality Mr. Hearst summoned the Examiner's business manager, Mr. Thomas H. Williams, to New York so that he could not be suspected of taking a hand in the primaries and later on he shipped him to Europe to remain until after election. Mr. Hearst is now anxious for perfect harmony in the Democratic party, and therefore the Examiner misrepresented the proceedings of the convention the other night. Its report of the proceedings was as far from the truth as one of Munchausen's choicest. According to the Examiner that was a very fine convention, and though there were some disputes they were amicably settled. The fact is that several districts bolted the convention out of sheer disgust with the methods of McNab. The Examiner also neglected to tell that Tommy Hickey, the elocutionist who can recite anything from "Fontenoy" to "Asleep on the Switch," and who was elected chairman, made an egregious blunder by taking occasion to denounce the Labor Party as a corrupt organization. Before the primaries McNab expected to enter into coalition with the Labor Party in the event of its being captured by Michael Casey, of the double-cross, but Schmitz having out-manoeuvred the cunning Celt, the wily Gavin has now determined to throw mud at the union politicians.

A Californian's Achievement

Few people who have been reading Lincoln Steffens's coruscating diatribes on the subject of municipal corruption, in McClure's Magazine, are aware of the fact that the brilliant young author is a Californian. He is one native son who had the good sense to begin his journalistic career in the broader field of the East, and consequently he was not so slow in achieving fame as those who loitered in this city for years before heading for the literary centre of the country. Steffens is from Sacramento where he was educated in the public schools. Later on he attended Berkeley and took a special course in English in the class of '89, but he did not graduate. His father was a wealthy citizen of Sacramento, and it was the old home of the family which was sold to the State several months ago to be occupied hereafter as the gubernatorial mansion. Steffens has written some scorching papers on the shame of our cities, and his exposes of the rottenness of conditions resulting from machine politics have done more for the good government propagandists than the combined howls of all the professional reformers in the country. I hear that he is coming to his home before the end of the year, and I shouldn't be surprised to learn that he contemplated turning over some of the gray stones of this city to see what lies beneath.

The Romance of the Tullys

Richard Watson Tully and his talented wife, known to literary fame as Eleanor Gates, have been stimulating social intercourse among the local literary lights during their present visit to the coast, and they have been very graciously distributing pointers to some of our ambitious young writers who are eager to break into the magazine field. The Tullys have been very successful, and Berkeley is proud of them because they were students at the university. Both enjoyed a Hearst scholarship. They were married while attending the university but kept the marriage a secret for a long time, thinking, it was said, that Mrs. Hearst would object to extending her scholarships to married folks. But when the secret leaked out Mrs. Hearst said "God bless you, my scholars," and continued their allowance until they took their sheepskins. Many of Mrs. Hearst's beneficiaries who prospered after leaving the university have returned the loan made to them, thus providing scholarships for other needy students. Among them are several women school teachers who saved the money out of their salaries. Among those who have made no returns are women who have married wealthy men.

The Tendency to Naturalism

Some critics have been disposed to find fault with Jack London because in his last book, "The Call of the Wild," his hero, the dog Buck, reverts to naturalism and becomes the leader of a pack. In La Revue Scientifique there is given an account of some Scotch collies, tame, docile and well-trained, which were imported into Patagonia. All went well for awhile, but the shepherds became careless in looking after the natural increase. The puppies were left to their own devices, deserted in the woods, and without the training and influence of man they went wild and preyed upon the flocks. The wild dogs were more destructive than wolves, being quite as strong, and more brave and intelligent. Some years ago there were numerous droves of wild hogs in California, the offspring of domestic animals which had strayed away from farm yards, and they were decidedly dangerous and unpleasant to meet.

Last week in my paragraph about the Sterling Postleys, I stated inadvertently that Mrs. Postley Sr. was a Miss Singer. The fact is that she was a Miss Sterling and in no way related to the Singers.

Merely a Suggestion

Far be it from me to indulge in captious criticism of my contemporaries of the daily newspaper field, but I am constrained to suggest that it is unfair and cruel to give publicity to the shame of the poor and humble when it does not concern the public and when its exposure subserves no public interest. In the despatches from San Rafael early this week was an item to the effect that a poor woman had found her daughter, who is not more than seventeen years of age, in the company of a young man under circumstances that prompted her to threaten the culprit with arrest if he did not marry the girl, and that a little later a license was secured and the marriage ceremony was performed. It is beyond question that if these young folk were the offspring of people of wealth and social prominence, the daily papers would have refrained from exposing their shame. I think it is beyond question because I know that similar incidents in high social circles have been overlooked by the daily press. It is proper that they should be overlooked, and I am puzzled to know why the same gracious forbearance is not extended to people in humble circumstances.

The lecture committee of the Channing Auxiliary is arranging a series of interesting and timely talks on living questions and book reviews by Mrs. Louise Benson, who conducted several successful courses here last season.

Now She's Studying German

What a wonderful old lady is Mrs. Eleanor Martin! She has more energy and ambition than many young girls scarcely out of their teens. She has lately been nursing the hope of becoming a great German scholar, and is now studying the language whenever she is not attending social functions or taking a nap between meals. Some of her friends say that her eagerness to master the tongue is due to the fact that she expects to take a trip to Germany with the Peter Martins, and entertains the hope that she will meet the Emperor. There are others who say that she loves the sentimental poetry of the German poets and is anxious to read it in the original.

Troubles of a San Jose Church

Rev. N. A. Haskell has again decided to sever his connection with the First Unitarian church in San Jose. During his pastorate there has been considerable discord in the church. Three years ago he had one of the largest and richest congregations in the city. About that time a strong sentiment was aroused against the professional politicians, and the clergyman became one of the most active of the reformers. He was accused of taking too active a part in politics and his attitude caused a split in his congregation. The fight waxed warm and the pastor, seeing that if he remained the church would suffer, decided to resign and did so. The National Assembly of the Unitarian Church did not approve of the resignation and desired the preacher to reconsider his action. He refused to do so and he was dropped by the national organization. The strife made great inroads into the membership of the church. Many left and others withdrew their support. For two years Professor Burt-Estes Howard of Stanford ministered to the wants of the congregation, but he could not teach and preach at the same time. The church wanted a permanent pastor. Finally it was decided to ask the Rev. Mr. Haskell to return. There was a great howl of disapproval, but the friends of the clergyman were in the majority and they carried a resolution to invite him to resume his old pulpit. That was about a year ago, and forty or fifty members opposed to his coming withdrew, among them being many of the most prominent members of the church. Mr. Haskell returned and the church prospered, and he was reinstated by the national organization. Now he has resigned again and the members look forward to a reconciliation of all factions.

The Autocrats of Colombia

It is with no astonishment that I read of Colombian officials delaying and withholding despatches sent from the Department of State to our representatives in that republic. Colombian officials are noted for their lofty contempt for the conventions. So accustomed have they become to arbitrary methods at home that they adopt them, as a matter of habit, in their dealings with other nations. As an example I may mention that the post office at Panama has on a number of occasions raised the postage rates upon foreign mail, notwithstanding the fact that Colombia belongs to the postal union, the members of which are limited by treaty to a postal rate of five cents per ounce for foreign postage. During the last rebellion in that country, letters received from abroad at Panama were often not delivered until after the payment of an additional fee. The average Colombian official in a position of authority generally does pretty much as he pleases, law or no law. If he does not like a law, he either breaks it or has it abrogated. Law, either international or local, is a joke in that benighted land. A little "white man's burden" policy in that part of the world would do much good.

Two Distinguished Officers Retired

The retirement upon the same day of two Rear-Admirals of the United States Navy is an unusual occurrence. It happened last Saturday, when two distinguished figures were removed from the active list. Admiral Silas Casey was the man who, by the exercise of his tact and diplomacy while on his flagship Wisconsin, brought together at Panama, a year ago, the leaders of the warring Conservative and Liberal parties of Colombia, and facilitated the negotiations for peace when the cause of the Liberals seemed as hopeless as that of the Conservatives had been a short time before. Casey was not only the preserver of the neutrality of trans-isthmian traffic during the disorders in Colombia, but he was also largely instrumental in bringing to a close the revolt that had devastated the country for three years. The other Rear-Admiral retired was Francis A. Cook, who commanded the cruser Brooklyn during the Spanish war. Cook was one of the exponents of the old-time seamanship. He was distinguished for his unwavering loyalty to his friends. During the inquiry into Schley's conduct during the Spanish war, which inquiry showed that much advertised officer's behavior up in a manner which was quite a surprise to the great uninformed mass of the people, Cook stood by Schley, his immediate commander on the Brooklyn, as far as his conscience would permit. Not once did his loyalty to his friend swerve, under the sorest tests.

A Crack Commander

In Captain Richardson Clover, who has been slated for the command of the new battleship Ohio, that latest production of the Union Iron Works will have a commander quite capable of making her the crack warship that both the Buckeye State and the Pacific coast expect her to be. Clover is almost one of us, having taken a summer home in Napa, where he spends much of his time off duty. Both he and his wife are social favorites here, as in Washington and London. The handsome Emory house in Washington, occupying an imposing site in Connecticut avenue, opposite the British Embassy, was the scene of numerous handsome entertainments during its ocupancy by the Clovers, who added to their social prestige in London when Captain Clover was made Naval Attache to the American Embassy to the Court of St. James.

Our Comic Opera Militia

While the Naval Militia of the State of California is in a state of decrepitude which recently called forth a scathing rebuke from a high officer in published orders, while it is rent by internal dissensions and battered by external criticisms for its failure to deserve its name, no one in authority appears to have either the inclination or the ability to undertake an intelligent remedy for the unfortunate conditions that surround it. Nerney has resigned the captaincy, and to find a suitable successor to him is a puzzle. Under the circumstances, I am impelled to inquire what has become of Commander R. H. Miner, a member of the gubernatorial staff and officially designated as "naval aid." Of what naval aid is Miner? Why is he not heard from? Why has he not inspected the Naval Militia? Miner was formerly a naval officer of good standing and ability, an Annapolis graduate, who has been but a short time out of the service. If his position on the Governor's staff is not a mere sinecure, why has he not been heard from? In my opinion Miner, if he would accept, should be given the command of the Naval Militia. He could make of it a real, valuable reserve for the Navy and a nautical auxiliary of the State militia. There is no other man in the organization at the present time who has had the naval training or the seafaring experience to make of it, as its commander, anything but the joke that it is now.

The Thirsty Jack Tar

The only thing remarkable in the recent episode upon the cruiser Olympia was not the theft of a barrel of alcohol but the explosion itself. There was nothing startling in the theft. Sailors have more originality, more resourcefulness and more ingenuity in securing things to get drunk with than any other class of human beings. They are never at a loss to find some substitute for whisky and brandy when such conventional intoxicants are not to be had. Alcohol, such as the Olympia men got hold of, is a popular beverage in the absence of whisky. The shellac carried upon men-of-war for varnishing purposes is such a common beverage among thirsty jack-tars that it has to be kept under lock and key and used under guard. Jalap is put in the alcohol of liquid compasses to keep the thirsty from draining them. Cologne is quite a treat, in a pinch, and the story is told of a surgeon on one of our old warships, who, being a good deal of a naturalist, was at a loss to account for the decay of some snakes, lizards and other specimens he had preserved in jars of alcohol, until investigation showed that water had been substituted for the liquid in the jars, and the alcohol consumed by some stealthy sailors. I recall the case of a vessel where the ship's cook reported the steady depletion of his stock of yeast, and the master-at-arms as steadily reported cases of mysterious intoxication in the crew, the ship being far from land at the time. Again investigation was resorted to, resulting in the discovery that the jackies had been pilfering the yeast, which they subjected to a treatment yielding them a satisfactorily intoxicating liquor.

A Brilliant Officer Leaves Us

The detachment of Lieutenant W. R. Gherardi from the flagship New York removes from the Pacific Squadron one of the best young officers in the service. Gherardi is the son of Rear-Admiral Bancroft Gherardi, one of the old school officers. He has three times been officially commended for gallantry, twice for saving life at the imminent peril of his own. During a severe storm on the Atlantic coast he deliberately jumped overboard into a tumultuous sea to save a sailor who had fallen from his ship. During the Spanish war, young Gherardi was attached to the Marblehead, under the command of Captain Bowman H. McCalla, and took a leading part in all the efficient, hazardous work that little cruiser performed in Cuban waters, including the cable-cutting at Cienfuegos and the operations in Guantanamo bay. He did more than his share of the dangerous picket duty in the Caimanera river, and was in charge of one of the boats that picked up the enemy's submarine mines near Cayo del Hospital, at the head of Guantanamo bay. He is one of the athletes of the service, and was a member of the academy football team when at Annapolis.

Where the Blame Rests

When I hear of trouble with the crew of a man-of-war, I immediately inquire who her officers are. In ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, an insubordinate crew is the result of having incompetent officers. In the case of the battleship Kearsarge, which is reported to be the scene of poor discipline and a nearly mutinous crew, I find that Captain J. N. Hemphill is her commanding officer. That explains much. A good officer never has much trouble with his men, no matter how bad they may happen to be. The crew of the Kearsarge is of the same excellent material to be found on all of our warships of the present day, and if it is in a state of demoralization the blame is to be found with the officers who mould the men, and ultimately with the commanding officer.

The General's Four Daughters

Matchmaking mammas could take a leaf from the book of General S. B. M. Young, who has had no difficulty in finding husbands for his four daughters, though no efforts were ever made to boom them for their beauty and charms. The youngest daughter, Mary, will after her marriage this month with Lieutenant Hannay, go to the Philippines. One of her sisters, who is married to Captain S. W. Reed, is at Monterey where her husband is stationed. Another sister is Mrs. J. H. Gibbon of Philadelphia. Helen Lillian Young did not make as good a match as her sisters, but she married for love and is presumably happy. It was Helen who went upon the stage, after doing San Francisco society for a season chaperoned by Mrs. Eleanor Martin. She married young Charles Charters, an actor of no great prominence, and at last accounts they were living in New York amid modest environments. Since General Young's elevation to the highest office in the United States Army he will live in Washington. He is looking out for a house sufficiently large to entertain in a manner becoming his station, and will, I am told, have his daughters with him as often as their husbands will permit visits. There is also a rumor that General Young may at last marry the beautiful young girl, his daughters' friend, with whom his name has been frequently coupled, and who visited San Francisco some seasons ago. At that time, Mrs. Eleanor Martin was also spoken of as the possible stepmother of the General's daughters.

Service Gossip

Doctor Williamson, who has been on duty at the general hospital at the Presidio, has been given charge of the army medical exhibit at the St. Louis fair, which will be a charming berth for him. He will be here this winter however, and not leave for St. Louis until the early spring. General regret is felt at the orders which remove Doctor Henry Page, U. S. A., from Fort Mason, where he has been on duty for several months, and send him to the Philippines. Mrs. Page, who is the daughter of Colonel and Mrs. Charles R. Greenleaf, is an exceptionally popular woman. There has seldom been a regiment here whose departure will be more regretted—save possibly the First Infantry when it marched away to do battle in Cuba—than the Seventh Infantry which leaves on the first of October for the Philippines. There will be a farewell dance of the Seventh at the Presidio, and a reception by General and Mrs. Coolidge in honor of the regiment next Thursday evening.

General and Mrs. Rawles and Miss Elizabeth Rawles, who have been occupying the home of Admiral Trilly in Fillmore street this summer, have gone to Santa Barbara for a week's stay and may possibly go East before they return to San Francisco, their future home.

The Joseph Sadoc Tobins have closed their summer home, Arcadia, and are at The Crossroads, Burlingame.

The Bachelor Maid Stormed

The green-eyed monster has been rampant at Del Monte, and principally on account of the strenuosity of a girl in monopolizing the attentions of some of the gay cavaliers who were regarded as the personal property of others. Her first catch was a tall and athletic golfer who has been very devoted to our most popular bachelor maid. He accompanied the strenuous maid into the maze, on walks around the lake and one night, on a moonlight promenade, while the bachelor maid stormed and raged in her cottage. The next day the delinquent swain returned to his first love, and the poaching maid could not lure him away again.

Her Distingulshed Courtesy

She is a very gracious girl, is this damsel who excited the jealousy of the less strenuous females. One night she took pity on a young man whose sensational elopement with a beautiful girl was the talk of last season. It was at a dinner in the club-house when he became afflicted with that tired feeling as a result of too much conviviality. He needed a little assistance to his room and she rendered it while his pretty little wife tilted her nose and remained at the table.

Some Were Not Cordial

The summer gayety came to an end on the golf links, on which, however, the seasoned matron who respects her complexion more than her reputation seldom ventures. Now all is quiet again, but yet Del Monte is at its very best, for the weather is heavenly, and the ocean is warm. It was a gay season for the fashionables but many suffered heart-pangs. I have in mind a beautiful woman who visited the hotel with hubby No. 2 and who has not taken much interest in society of late. Her divorce excited a great deal of interest and her second marriage occasioned no surprise. She entertained lavishly and wore superb raiment. Many were cordial but others were not. The reason was evident; she is one of the most beautiful women that ever figured in the smart set. Beauty breeds envy. Among the very gayest of the gay were the Parker Whitneys. Young Whitney is a volatile chap, and he never permits the fun to lag. His pretty wife bore herself with much quiet dignity, and was very popular at the hotel.

The eldest daughter of the Downey Harveys is not to make her debut for a year yet. She has been studying German in Austria, and now she is to spend a year in France perfecting herself in French. Mrs. Harvey, who is very studious herself, will follow the same course as her daughter. The younger girl will remain in a convent.

Another Stockton Engagement

By a slip of the pen last week I was made to call Reel B. Terry the "latest" instead of the "late" husband of Mrs. Georgia Kelsey Terry of Stockton. Mrs. Terry has been married but once. Following fast on the announced engagement of her daughter Bernie to Frank West, come very definite and pronounced rumors that the fair widow will become a bride again and that the interesting event will take place before her daughter's wedding. Dr. W. G. Wallace, a Stockton dentist and a brother of J. H. Wallace, civil engineer in the service of the Southern Pacific Company, has been devoted to Mrs. Terry for a long time, and now that her daughter is about to be established to her satisfaction it is said she will devote the rest of her time to the Doctor. Dr. Wallace is a widower and has a little son about four years old. His wife was a Miss Hartwell of Sacramento and she died a few weeks after the birth of her baby. She was a sister of Mrs. Colvin Brown and that lady has had the care of the little fellow since her sister's death. Though the wedding is authoritatively spoken of as an October event I'm wondering if the serious illness of Colvin Brown, Dr. Wallace's brother-in-law, may not change the plans somewhat.

Miss Rosenbaum's marriage to Karl Triest of Los Angeles was celebrated on Wednesday at high noon at the Rosenbaums' pretty Stockton home. The wedding followed fast on the heels of the engagement announcement and was the first of the fall season. The lawn was enclosed with canvas and furnished a picturesque setting for the pretty scene. Miss Rosenbaum's trousseau was especially handsome, for Mrs. Rosenbaum has excellent taste in such matters and her daughters inherit it. Mr. and Mrs. Triest left immediately for a European tour. Frank West will take his bride to Europe also, but the wedding may not take place till spring.

Mr. and Mrs. James Follis are still lingering in San Rafael, and are in no hurry to return.

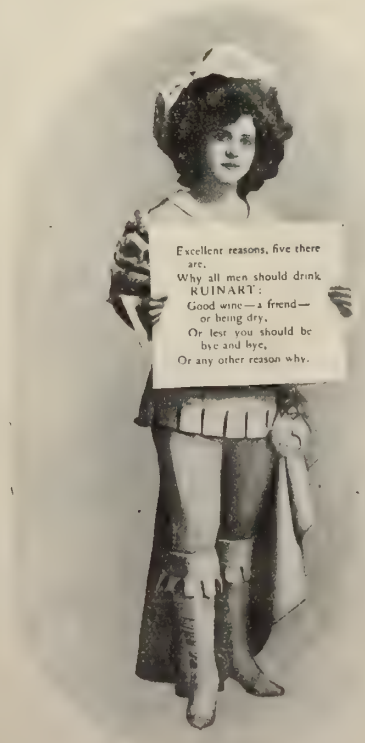
To Spend the Winter Here

Mrs. Carrie Colton Martin is to pass the winter in this city, I hear, with her daughter Mrs. Frank Grace, who has been visiting her at Santa Cruz. She is very devoted to her daughter and cannot bear separation from her. Her unmarried daughter Katherine will also remain here and she will enter a private school. The Martins and Graces came up from Santa Cruz a few days ago and they are now occupying the Drexler house.

Among the arrivals at Byron Springs last week were Mr. and Mrs. L. G. Rowell, L. E. Van Winkle, Mr. and Mrs. W. L. Hawkins of San Francisco, and John T. Bowles of Honolulu.

An International Love Match

The solicitors of the Duke of Roxburghe have come over from England to arrange the preliminaries of the great international match with Miss Goelet. When the engagement was first announced the assurance was given out that it was an ideal love-match, but it was not credited by those who had been following the career of Miss Goelet, and who were led to believe that she was on a hunt for a nobleman who would be willing to exchange his title for slathers of sound money. This later report of the arrival of the solicitors gives color to the suspicions of the incredulous, but of course it does not follow that because the Duke wants the money in hand before taking the plunge, that the match about to be consummated is one in which Dan Cupid does not figure. The Duke is probably a business man, and as such he would naturally feel that business comes before pleasure. Miss Goelet has many charms with which to win a man's love and her money is not the least of them. It may have been the one that first excited the Duke's passion, but it does not follow that he is purely a mercenary character. No doubt if she had no money he would never have wooed her, but having it she compelled his admiration, aroused his interest and stimulated the ardent passion essential to a love-match. There is a prejudice in this country against the cold-blooded delivery of an American girl into the arms of an impecunious titled foreigner. Few stop to think of the sacrifice made by the nobleman who becomes the husband of a rattle-brained maiden whose highest ambition is to sport a title.



Wily Heiress Hunters

The millions that have been taken across the pond through dots and settlements in these international marriages foot up a surprising penny. Some of the richest rentals in New York, Washington, Boston and Chicago are sent regularly to London, Paris and Berlin to be spent in bolstering up the estates of titled men, husbands of rich American girls. And now comes that gay young social brigand, the Duke of Roxburghe, and after the manner of Lochinvar rides away with one of the best-looking of the New York set, together with something like a wedding portion of ten million dollars, besides the income on about twenty million dollars more. Yellow journalism is responsible in great part for this greatly increased price in titled husbands. Ever since it began exploiting and touting the matrimonial doings of the earls, dukes and such who had captured American heiresses prices have been steadily on the rise. Fulsome details regarding the social doings of Lady Curzon, the Duchess of Marlborough, Countess de Castellane and their tea-mates, together with the highly colored fakes of what they don't do, flush the golden game in high feather for these heiress hunting freebooters.

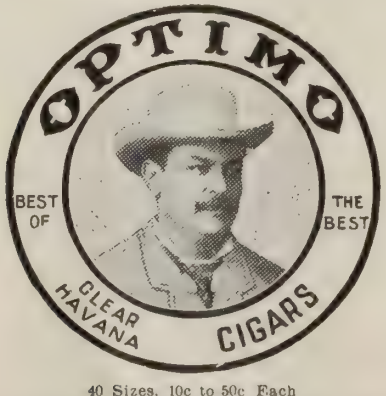
Californians Among the Nobility



This latter day extravagance in titled husbands was given considerable impetus many years ago by the daughters of the new-rich pioneers of California. One of the first to set the fashion in foreign escutcheons was Maggie Hamilton, a Californian who married Sir Sidney Waterlow, and whose son was lately cutting a dash in Newport, no doubt in the hope of emulating the example of his father. Then Flora Sharon, daughter of that gay lothario, Senator Sharon, married Sir Thomas Hesketh, and by the way, her son came of age the other day, and the event was celebrated with great pomp on her Northamptonshire estate. Then John Mackay's step-daughter married the Italian Prince, Colonna, from whom she was divorced a few years ago. Later on came the marriage of Mamie Donahue and Baron von Schroeder, and then out came Prince Poniatowski to wed Maud Bourke, the niece of rich old Horace Carpentier. But there was a dispute over the dot, and the prince married Miss Sperry, while Maud captured a baronet in the person of Sir Bache-Cunard. J. B. Haggin's daughter won a count—Festetics de Tolna—and little Miss Rooney of Fresno, a vaudeville performer, became the wife of Lord Sholto Douglas. One of the best matches from the social standpoint was that of Miss Virginia Bonynge, who became the Viscountess Deerhurst. From this list it is evident that a great deal of Californian gold has been used in the regilding of foreign titles.

Some Big Dots

Californian girls, however, have contributed a very small percentage of the American millions that have purchased foreign titles. The widow Hammersley of New York took ten millions with her when she went across the pond as the wife of the Duke of Marlborough. The Bradley-Martins are not only scattering their American gold abroad to attract attention to their social entertainments but are helping their daughter all they can to win distinction in the same way. When she became the bride of the Earl of Craven they gave her titled husband a dot of more than a million. Lord Blackwood pocketed a like sum when he married Flora Davis, daughter of an American banker. Nearly ten years ago the Count de Castellane's lawyers haggled with the Goulds till they got five million dollars out of the estate as her marriage settlement. Later on the Gould brothers had to pony up several millions more to keep this extravagant scion of nobility out of financial troubles. Several years later the same squeeze was repeated. In the law proceedings in which the count became involved it came out that the Goulds gave him a regular allowance of two hundred thousand dollars a year. No wonder the titled riff-raff are so anxious to capture American heiresses.

Chaffering Over Dots

When the present Duke of Marlborough captured Consuelo Vanderbilt she was given a million dollars by her father. The Duke gets the income from ten million dollars, his wife's share of the family estate. She has other expectations, too, so no doubt the prudent Duke will eventually finger a big part of the fortune of Mrs. O. H. P. Belmont, mother of his wife. Last year he certainly came in for a good bit of fortune. His rich American father-in-law presented him with a semi-royal residence in London for a Christmas gift. Mary Leiter of Chicago brought the Earl of Curzon more than a million dollars in cash, besides many gifts in the shape of valuable property holdings. When Miss Morton, daughter of Ex-Governor Morton of New York, went abroad as the Countess Boson Perigord of France, she took with her some six hundred thousand dollars, besides the expectations to her share of the big Morton estate. That farce-comedy international match, the Duke of Manchester-Zimmerman affair, netted that hungry and frayed young nobleman over a million dollars in American coin, besides an assured income running into a handsome figure. The haggling Earl of Yarmouth got as much out of Mrs. Thaw before he would go to the altar and marry her daughter. Indeed he kept the ceremony waiting while his man of business counted and tested the money paid over and scrutinized the values of the securities offered as pledges in the settlement. Clara Huntington, who became Princess Hatzfeldt, carried a tidy fortune abroad.

Great Chance for a Title Boom

These are the most notable of the heiresses who have helped to rehabilitate with their money the tattered fortunes of foreign noblemen. It is safe to say that the others, most of whom married ordinary baronets and stage property princes, have taken enough American money abroad to support several principalities. Despite this hypnotic spell which a title seems to throw over some American heiresses, American brains and hustle continue to rake the dollars of the world this way. There is only one event that could vary the monotony of things—the appointment of the Duke of Marlborough to the office of Governor-General of Canada. It would only take the sight of Consuelo Vanderbilt dispensing the social honors of the government at Ottawa to render the Newport set completely daffy. Yellow journalism would do the rest with its hysterical reports of the functions and the wild-eyed "society" heiresses would be offering fabulous prices for anything in men's suitings sporting an insignia of title.

The Dahlia Show

Dr. Harry Tevis had a beautiful exhibit of dahlias all ready to send to the California State Floral Society's show last Friday, but withdrew them at the last moment because they didn't please his critical eye. Their freshness had been marred by the sun. Others were not so particular but sent theirs along, sun-dried or not. The show was very largely attended, and the exhibit of dahlias one of the finest ever seen here. Mr. Rudolph Lichtenberg's remarks on dahlia culture and the preservation of the blooms were pertinent and full of interest to the flower enthusiasts present. The society has gained many members during the past year. Mrs. Austin Sperry is one of the directors. Dr. Tevis is a life member. Among the contributing members are Mrs. Emma Shafter Howard, Mrs. Mary Kohl of San Mateo, Mrs. Fannie Lent, Mrs. Martin, Mrs. Scale, Mrs. Richard Spreckels, Miss Hittell, Mrs. Walter Scott and Timothy Hopkins. All of the members were not numbered among the dahlia exhibitors, for many do not care for these odorless blooms. There are gardens in San Francisco, however, that might have contributed to the showing. The William M. Lents' garden at Polk and Eddy streets contains beautiful dahlias and there are gardens in Berkeley and Alameda that show the dahlia in variety. Several prizes were carried off on Friday by George Pope's gardener, and Luther Burbank captured a special prize. F. A. Carlson and Madame Roeckel gained special mention for their collections. Something that interested Eastern people present was the exhibit of F. A. Miller, all of whose blooms grew in sand. The Pacific Coast Horticultural Society will hold a dahlia exhibition this afternoon and evening in Maple hall of the Palace, and it will be quite a society affair. Society here is just beginning to wake up to the fact that flower shows are worth going to. In London and New York they are always made the medium for sporting the smartest frocks and hats, and millinery generally vies with the flowers in attracting admiring gaze.

A Costly Fire

Professor Emory E. Smith, who is one of the most active spirits in the conduct of the Floral Society, is the author of a book on the California poppy, giving the history, romance, etc., that are connected with the golden eschscholtzia. And not everybody knows that the volume had a history of its own, rather more exciting than that of the flower. Professor Smith had for years been collecting items, poems and bits of reference about the State flower. He intended to publish a book about the eschscholtzia when his accumulations were complete. But his Chinese servant happened upon the pile of clippings and saw in it only a magnificent heap of paper for lighting the morning fire, and he consigned the valuable collection to the flames. It was a sad loss to Professor Smith, but he did not despair, and in course of time managed to restore most of the facts and verses, the result being his book of a year or two ago.

Married to Please His Mother

There appears to be another side to the story of a recent separation in Oakland society which I predicted some weeks before the daily papers told about it. The mother of the young man is of Southern blood and she didn't think there was a girl in California good enough for her son to marry. So she hunted up one of unquestionable antecedents in Tennessee and made the match. The young man wasn't at all keen about it but he finally married "to please mamma." The result was that he stood the solitude a deux for about a month after his marriage and then sought consolation in the wine cup. He remained out late at night and did various other things very unbecoming in bridegrooms. The proud spirit of Tennessee resented this and the sharp tongue of Tennessee expressed the resentment in cogent English. The man's family tried to patch it up but when there is no love to patch with it's hard darning. The result, the wife has gone to Tennessee and the husband to the Orient—a poor place to brace up in. The parents talk of a reunion later but the result will probably be a quiet divorce. It's love that makes the domestic wheels go 'round.

The Stork in Oakland

The stork is hovering over two large homes in Oakland and is soon expected to make W. W. Foote a happy grandfather. The other household on which the bird is planning to alight is that of Dr. J. P. H. Dun, who married the youngest of Mrs. Remi Chabot's daughters some two years ago. "Billy" Foote, by the way, has rounded into condition after several months of ill health. By the advice of his physicians he kept away from his law-office for quite awhile, and took to the fishing streams of the interior to recuperate. The popular attorney is an ardent fisherman, and he is as dexterous in the manipulation of line and rod as he is in the cross-examination of a reluctant witness.

The Borax Smiths

The F. M. Smiths, after all, have fun with their money and are far less at sea than most people who have become wealthy in middle life. Mr. and Mrs. Smith are devoted to each other in spite of their great wealth, which is somewhat unusual, and Mrs. Smith delights in her two magnificent homes, one as fine as the other, on both sides of the continent. She also likes handsome clothes though she is far from extravagant, and she has some costly jewels which she wears instead of keeping them in the safe, the famous diamond necklace being, of course, an exception. Last year the Smiths had a sailing yacht; this year they have a steam yacht, said to be one of the best around New York. It came in a close second with Pierpont Morgan's unbeaten steam yacht when the Smiths attended the international yacht races. Mrs. Smith spends much money in charity and all of the Smiths love to travel, another circumstance which distinguishes them from some millionaires who have never been off the continent and can scarcely be induced to go even to New York. In this regard the Butters family, also millionaires of recent make, are like the Smiths. They enjoy traveling and entertaining, a handsome house and fine clothes—in fact, they know the pleasant uses to which money may be put. Mrs. Butters is a remarkable woman. She has been married three times and she has been happy and much loved by each of her husbands.

Dr. Henrietta Steinegger and Mrs. Emil Steinegger gave an informal "at home" to a number of their friends at their Fruitvale home on Wednesday.

Didn't Please Mamma

The marriage of young Hush without the consent of his family has been the source of great annoyance to his mother. He was expected to make a fine match from the social standpoint, but he preferred to give reign to his sentimental yearnings. His wife is a cultured woman and was formerly a music teacher. He has been very prosperous since his marriage. It was his sisters, by the way, who married the Magee boys, and who are very popular in social circles.

The last two performances of "Everyman," the old morality play, will be given at Lyric hall, Eddy street, today at three p. m. and eight-thirty p. m. The "Everyman" company will then leave San Francisco for a week to fill engagements at Stanford University, San Jose, Oakland and Berkeley University; returning to Lyric hall September twenty-eighth for three performances of "Twelfth Night," which will be given in all the quaintness of the Elizabethan style.

Miss Sartoris's Reported Fiance

Miss Rosemary Sartoris has not been engaged so many times as her sister Vivian was, before the latter finally married Frederic Roosevelt Scovel, the President's cousin. The former desired to follow an artistic career, and studied in Paris with that end in view. But, if what my Washington correspondent writes me be true, Miss Rosemary's heart has been dented by Cupid's arrow and she will soon follow her sister's example. The happy man is said to be Lieutenant John Wright, an officer in the U. S. N. and a son of General Marcus J. Wright, who was on the Confederate side in the Civil war. There has been some comment on the fact that a granddaughter of General U. S. Grant should engage herself to the son of a Confederate officer, but it was not so long ago that the gossips were marrying Rosemary's widowed mother to an ex- Confederate. Young Algernon Sartoris threatened to declare himself a subject of Great Britain when his mother objected to his throwing up his commission in our Army a few months back. The Grant descendants appear to have inherited that quality of temperament that distinguished the "Fight-it-out-on-this-line-if-it-takes-all-summer" General.

Will Soon Revisit New York

The Princess Cantacazune, cousin of the Sartoris sisters, is shortly to visit New York. She is now in Paris, visiting her aunt, Mrs. Potter-Palmer, and after a short season at the French resorts she will cross the Atlantic. It is five years since the marriage of Julia Dent Grant with Prince Michael Cantacazune Speransky, to which the newspapers of two continents devoted pages of description. It was a love match, though perhaps a little ambition and money may have entered into it. The Cantacazunes have lived in Russia ever since, the Prince being a power in military and political life in that country. They have a son, little Count Michael Speransky, who is the idol of both parents.

The Tearful Troth

It is the tale that has been often told,
The story of a love that leaps to life
And blooms in beauty, though a dark distrust
Lurks ever near to menace and destroy.

It is the legend of a love that lives
Through doubting days and through the harrowing hours
Of long and lonely nights; a love that dreams
Of unforgettable and feverish things
That burn within the blood and bring again
The memory of the murmured midnight vow,
When mutual, melting lips were wont to tell
The thrilling and—perhaps—the tearful troth.

Ah, fond and fair, low-voiced and lovely-limbed,
Made of the classic clay that wakens men
To valorous deeds, or drugs them with desire,
Until they dream that lust and love are one—
I see thy faultless face from dawn to dark,
And through the night it haunts me till I feel
That I could gladly give my life to live
One brief, ambrosial hour on thy white breast.

But while these memories of the past outweigh
A world of present woe, I feel as one,
Who—worn and wearied in a wilderness
Wherein no fountain springs or food is found—
Dreams of the glorious days that once were his,
The feast, the flagon and the flowers and fruit,
And listens to the long-lost melody
Of one familiar, unforgotten voice.

So in my dreams I often feel the lips
That kissed away my cares and chained my soul
Within a charm that time can never break,
Then wake to wonder if I ever steal
Into thy thoughts as thou dost into mine.

September, 1903. LOUIS A. ROBERTSON.

The Woman's Viewpoint

"Simply ridiculous!"

Those were the two words with which Mrs. Baxter expressed her judgment of the play she had attended that afternoon at the Alcazar. She was accompanied by her husband, Tom Baxter, and it was to him that she gave utterance to her conviction after the performance.

"I'm surprised that you didn't like 'Gioconda,'" he said. "I consider it a masterpiece of dramatic art, a superb story, poetical and strong."

"All rot," said Mrs. Baxter.

"Why is it all rot?"

"Because it's an exposition of a man's capacity as a lover, and one of its purposes is to prove that a man can be untrue to his wife without meaning any harm. That's a fiction that the sex has long been engaged in promulgating."

"But," said Baxter, "you know that man is polygamous?"

"No, I don't. I know that some men contend that such is the case, but I believe that they merely want an excuse for their infidelities."

"Well, is there anything improbable about a man's being in love with his wife and at the same time entertaining an absorbing passion for the beautiful woman who inspired his art?"

"Of course such a thing is improbable," said Mrs. Baxter with great positiveness. "The man who indulges such a passion doesn't love his wife. He merely thinks he does."

"That's the woman's viewpoint," said Mr. Baxter, and a cynical smile wreathed his lips.

"I suppose you think that you could love me and have an intrigue with another woman."

There was considerable fire in Mrs. Baxter's eyes as she uttered those words.

"I'm not an artist, my dear."

Mr. Baxter's tone was conciliatory.

"But you are a man and men think they are polygamous, you know."

"So they are, my dear, but some men's sense of honor enables them to overcome their animal proclivities."

"Then it is only a sense of honor that would restrain you from engaging in a liaison." The fire in Mrs. Baxter's eyes glowed fiercely.

"Why, I didn't say so," said Mr. Baxter uneasily, and in a tone of deprecation.

"But that is the inference."

"Well, I intended no such deduction to be made. However, the polygamous tendency has never asserted itself in me, but I know that my sense of honor—"

"Your sense of honor—who cares for your sense of honor in such a matter? I shouldn't care for your fidelity if it were due solely to a sense of honor. It was his sense of honor that prompted Lucio to attempt suicide. D'Annunzio doesn't say so, but it's the fact, nevertheless."

"I think you're mistaken, my dear."

"Of course you do; you take the man's viewpoint. You think he was in love with his wife; that his love for her was the sacred affection that a wife should have, and that he was under Gioconda's mysterious spell that arose out of his temperamental devotion to his art. You probably think, too, as most men do, that the wife should have done just as Sylvia did—nurse him back to life. Men think that their wives should be satisfied with that sacred affection and understand that their little infidelities are sins of the flesh and not of the soul."

"Well, my dear, it is true that the passion married men spend in their clandestine amours is purely animal, and that it does not affect in the slightest degree their affection for their wives."

"But," said Mrs. Baxter, "the fact is that wives feel that they are entitled to all that passion as well as the affection that is vouchsafed them."

Thereupon Mr. Baxter went into a deep brown study, and Mrs. Baxter closed the argument by remarking:

"I wonder how the average married man would feel if he learned that it was his wife's sense of honor that kept her true to him."

—The Playgoer.

STAGE

D'Annunzio's Drama

To Florence Roberts San Francisco theatregoers are indebted for an introduction to Gabriele D'Annunzio, the distinguished playwright who won the affections of Eleanora Duse, and then betrayed her in a novel. It was rather an ambitious effort for the Alcazar stock company to produce his "Gioconda" at a special matinee in the midst of a stock season, for such a production involves a great deal of extra hard work. The players should hardly be expected, under the circumstances, to give a smooth and thoroughly satisfactory initial performance, and that they succeeded in giving a plausible interpretation of such an unusual play is indeed surprising. In "Gioconda" even the student finds little cause for judicious enthusiasm. It is a problem play of deep psychological interest, of brilliant dialogue and masterly limning of character, but it is lacking in dramatic situations. It is distinguished by a fine subtlety of art and a brilliancy of imagination that is almost Oriental, but it is loaded down with verbiage. The first two acts are all words. The dialogue is beautiful but it is unrelieved by action. It takes two whole acts for D'Annunzio to explain his motif properly, to impress you with the harrowing problem that disturbs the mental equilibrium of the sculptor Lucio. He desires to thoroughly acquaint you with the fact that Lucio is in a devil of a fix; that he loves his wife as a gentleman should because she is his wife and the mother of his child, and that he appreciates her devotion to him; also that he has a passionate regard for his model, Gioconda, who inspires all his work. The latter's fascination is half sensuous, half mystical, and while Lucio would like to be true to his wife he is reluctant to give up the beautiful model who not only appeals to his animal passion but also enables him to create great statuary. The simple fact is that Lucio is weak, and his morals are bad, but D'Annunzio extenuates his shortcomings like a true poet. He ascribes them all to his artistic temperament. His play is like a dissection of the human soul with the poet always visible above the surgeon. It reeks of morbid philosophy, illuminated by the Italian's unquestionable deftness in the use of all the literary tools and methods. The skill of his craftsmanship is superb, but he has written a play that affords better satisfaction in the reading than in the acting. Fancy sitting through a whole act in which the hero seeks to make his mad infatuation, and the torture he suffers, clear to the audience, in bursts of hysterical utterances. It would be easy in Italian grand opera, with appropriate orchestral accompaniment and mediæval environment, but in a modern living-room with people in up-to-date costume it is a severe tax on the poetic fancy and imagination. Mr. Lucius Henderson worked like a beaver through this scene, but he can scarcely be credited with having saved it from becoming bathetic. He has not the nervous force nor the refinement of art to put the audience en rapport with the character. However he held his audience of women through it all, and prepared them for the thrill in the third act, when his wife (Florence Roberts) confronted the tenacious Gioconda, and berated her for her unholy passion. This is really a powerful scene, in which the poet puts an argument into the model that overwhelms the wife, and drives her to the expedient of lying in the hope of breaking up the relationship between her husband and the object of his passion. In this scene Florence Roberts is vibrant with emotion, and her elocution is very effective, but the situation was not made as tense as it should be. The dramatic flame was there but it flickered perceptibly. This situation involves the one great climax of the play, but to invest it with the interest D'Annunzio intended, rare delicacy and ingenuity are required in the development of all that precedes it. There is nothing in the character of Silvia Settala beyond the temperament of Florence Roberts. She was equal not only to the demand for emotional fire but in the last act, the most poetic of the play, she exhibited superb repose. It was in this act that Miss Virginia Brissac, as the fisher girl, scored a most pronounced hit. The play is marred by the slightest suggestion of a false note. It is a play remarkable for its unity of idea, and for the domination of one central idea around which all else revolves. Each character plays an important part in the unfolding of the plot, and like a squadron of warships the speed of the cast is measured by that of the slowest member.

Her Magda

Florence Roberts is interesting in anything that she undertakes, for she has individuality and the courage of her conception. And being an intelligent woman there is always reason for her conception. Her Magda is a study worth while. She brings out the emotional side of the character with force and directness, and she plays it with becoming dignity and intensity. She compels admiration for the independence of the woman and stirs the sympathies of her audience. There is one feature of Florence Roberts's histrionic work that I consider worthy of special commendation. I so consider it because I have lately been seriously annoyed by the inarticulate utterances of the twin stars at the Columbia. Nobody ever has an difficulty in understanding what Florence Roberts is talking about. Clearness of enunciation has always been considered of paramount importance in the histrionic profession, but there are some thespians nowadays who appear to think that an audience likes to be kept busy picking up threads of the play.

Their Season's End

Prestige is a valuable asset in the theatrical business but it cannot serve as a substitute for merit. The Miller-Anglin combination has an abundance of prestige which it earned in this city by judicious enterprise in supplying the demand for high-class entertainment. By its artistic achievements in the past it established a reputation which is not to be lived up to with a company such as now supports the stars at the Columbia or with plays of the character of those that constitute this year's repertoire. The company is not lacking in talent but it is not capable of the pace set by those that made theatrical history in past seasons. It is as strong as many that support some of the brightest stars in Broadway, but the twin stars have made Columbia patrons hypercritical and fastidious. They have accustomed us to all-star casts, and having done so they should not blame us for not enthusing over budding artists and embryonic geniuses. It is to the weakness of the repertoire, however, rather than to the shortcomings of the company, that Mr. Miller and Miss Anglin should attribute their failure to keep the box office men busy this season. They have been winding up their engagement this week with a play altogether too insipid to serve as bait for their theatrical hook. "The Aftermath" is full of dramatic interest but not to the habitual theatregoer. Nearly everybody has seen some version of "Le Maitre des Forges" and those who have not are at least familiar with the motif and a few of the situations, for the story has been rehashed and adapted and cribbed by scores of playwrights, and it has furnished suggestions to many who have not scrupled to borrow from it. Therefore it passeth my understanding why Henry Miller wasted his time moulding "The Aftermath" into shape. His first effort as a playwright is not without merit, but it is impossible to say where Miller begins and where any of his predecessors left off. It runs smoothly enough through three acts, and then comes the fourth with a climax almost as unsatisfactory as the one that closes "The Devil's Disciple." Philippe Derblay is not a congenial role for Mr. Miller, or at least, he did not play it as though he entered into the spirit of it. When he started off to the duel ground with the parting suggestion to his wife, "Pray for me," he spoke as though he expected to raise a laugh instead of exciting pity. Miss Anglin is a highly pathetic Claire, and effectively hysterical. One of the most refreshing bits of work was that of Miss Claire Kulp in a tiny ingenue role.

Cunningham May Be Starred

Arthur Cunningham may be missed from the Tivoli when the comic opera season opens, and the probability is that when he next appears here it will be as a star in an Irish play. It will be remembered that Cunningham made a most pronounced hit in "The Highwayman." The role of the rollicking Irish brigand was so well suited to his temperament and his brogue that he carried off the bulk of the honors, although Camille D'Arville was starred in the production, and Edwin Stevens was conspicuous in the cast. I called attention to the manner in which Cunningham scored, but I was not the only one who was impressed with the notion at the time, that his talents were worth exploiting in the field of Irish drama. Will O'Connell, the business manager of the Miller-Anglin company, attended a performance of "The Highwayman," and the next day he wrote to Manager Charles B. Dillingham telling him that Cunningham was worth starring. O'Connell says that Chauncey Olcott, who has been making lots of money in Irish pieces, isn't in Cunningham's class, and that he thinks big money is to be made out of the Tivoli baritone if properly handled.

Joseph Arthur's Indian Melodrama

It is not the India of Kipling or Mrs. Flora Annie Steele that Joseph Arthur has pictured in his melodrama, "The Cherry Pickers," the Central's bill this week. Except for the soldiers, the half-caste element and the accompaniment of peculiarly-garbed servants going about with fans and cool drinks, the scenes might indicate any other section of country. But the drama is entertaining and the scenery is beautiful. There is more than one intensely exciting moment, particularly when the great gun goes off in the gun-room at the Fort. Miss Lawton has the role of the very much persecuted heroine, which she invests with her usual charm, and Herschel Mayall is just the sort of hero that the parquet as well as the gallery loves. Miss Woodthorpe and Miss Vane, as the fascinating widow and not less bewitching daughter, are excellently cast. Emery makes a most attractive and lovable young lover. A clever piece of work, by Elmer Booth, overdrawn perhaps by the author, and which alternately amuses or repels, is the valet of the Commandant, a ratty little sub-villain who has the centre of the stage throughout much of the play.

Something New in Vaudeville

The Orpheum has an attraction of decided and novel interest in the four Ransby tableaux, showing features of the Paris exhibition of three years ago. Those who were in Paris at the time naturally enjoy revisiting the scenes they so pleasantly remember, and those who were not there are given glimpses of what they missed. The East Indian prima donna, Princess Losaros, has magnetism and vocal ability. The new monologuist "with the green gloves" is entertaining. Frederic Bond & Co. manage to amuse again with their farce, and there are plenty of other good things on the bill. The Orpheum never has to complain of lack of patronage; it is always crowded.

Only One More Week of the Pollards

The little Pollards put loads of life into "The Lady Slavey," which though not entirely new to us is a novelty done by juveniles. Daphne and Master Jack are the popular stars, Daphne taking the principal role and Jack that of the sheriff's officer. Merle Pollard as the music-hall artist is also very clever. The octet, "Kiss-Kiss-Kiss" is charmingly done. The latter part of the week has been given up to "The Geisha" and next week the Pollards will be seen in a repertory of successes including Cellier's "Dorothy," which has not been given in San Francisco since Alice Vincent appeared in the title role at the Tivoli several years ago.

When Robert Edeson comes to the Columbia with his New York company next month, society will have a new man to lionize. This is Richard Sterling, a young man who was recently willed one hundred and fifty thousand dollars but intends to continue upon the stage in spite of this windfall. Sterling's aunt, Mrs. Joseph Pettee, was quite a prominent figure in New York and Boston society and it was she who left him the thousands.

In "The Prince of Pilsen," at the Columbia next week, Trixie Friganza has the role of the widow. The Hans Wagner of the cast has to ask her, at least twenty times, "Vos you effer in Cincinnati?" As Miss Friganza was born in Cincinnati, the question takes on an excess of humor and the widow always enjoys it.

McIvor-Tyndall, form one of the most popular means of entertainment for those who like to combine instruction with their pastime. Judging from the immense audiences that have greeted the famous psychologist at Steinway hall each succeeding Sunday night, the number of these is large. The marvelous powers of the mind of man, which are at present claiming the attention of the scientific world, are manifested and explained by Tyndall in a manner that accords with the latest developments of material science. There is nothing of the weird or supernatural about these manifestations, although they are wonderful enough to startle and astonish with their results. Dr. McIvor-Tyndall is to the psychological world what Marconi is to the material world. The results of the investigations of each of them find common ground in the theory of their cause, namely, thought-vibrations. To-morrow night Tyndall will give manifestations of this subtle, invisible vibratory force, in addition to his lecture, which will be on "Hypnotism: Good and Bad." Those who attend the demonstration may expect something worth hearing on this fascinating subject. Tyndall is recognized as the great authority on the power of hypnotism. The following Sunday night the subject will be "What is Clairvoyance?"

Features of Next Week's Bills

During the engagement of "The Prince of Pilsen" at the Columbia there will be Sunday night performances; matinees will be given on Wednesdays and Saturdays. There is already large demand for the various performances of this musical comedy success. Nick Long and Idalene Cotton are great favorites in "The Prince's" cast. The chorus consists of Vassar Girls, Sea Shell Girls, Bathing Girls, French Maids, Jockey Girls and all the other widely talked-of charmers. The cast is the same that has kept Chicago in a swirl of laughter and good humor for weeks past, together with the same chorus and large orchestra. Trixie Friganza is the prima donna of the company.

At the Grand the little Pollards will be seen tomorrow matinee and night and Monday in "Paul Jones," which Agnes Huntington starred in some years ago, just before she married her millionaire. Cellier's charming "Dorothy" will be given on Tuesday and Wednesday nights; "Pinafore" on Thursday and Friday nights and Saturday matinee with Daphne Pollard as Sir Joseph Porter; on Saturday, the farewell night, "The Belle of New York." At all matinees, the ladies and children in attendance will be presented with souvenir pictures of the most popular Lilliputians. Sunday, September twenty-seventh, James Neill will appear in "A Gentleman of France."

During her recent tour of the State, the most popular play in Florence Roberts's repertory was "The Adventure of the Lady Ursula," in which Margaret Anglin appeared at the Columbia some seasons ago. The character of the mischievous Lady Ursula is well suited to Miss Roberts, and the play is sure to make a hit in its Alcazar presentation. The Hope comedy will temporarily give place on Thursday matinee and night, and Friday night, to special performances of D'Annunzio's "Gioconda," and will be resumed for Saturday matinee and night and Sunday night.

In "Carmen" at the Tivoli the title role will be sung by Cleo Marchesini, who has scored many successes in the part in Italy. Adelina Tromben will appear as Michaela, Ischierdo as Don Jose and Zanini as Escamillo. Others in the cast will be Zani, Cortesi, Fogarty, Jacques, Miss Welsh and Miss Gibson. In "La Traviata," the alternating bill, Tina de Spada will be Violetta and Agostini, Alfredo. Gregoretti is cast for the part of the elder Germont. Marie Welsh will sing Flora and Nettie Deglow, Annina. Travaglini has Dr. Grenvil and Cortesi will appear as Gastone.

There will be several new features added to the Fischer burlesque Monday night. The next play to follow "The Glad Hand" and "The Con-curers" is "The Paraders." The comedy is said to be different in many ways from anything offered heretofore. The music will be heard for the first time in any theatre and this production will cost more than any offered in the past. The students of Stanford University have secured Fischer's for the night of the football game, November fourteenth. There will be many novel features introduced on that occasion.

The Central next week will enthuse its patrons with "After Dark," the play that the distinguished dramatist, Dion Boucicault, adapted from the French, and concerning the rights to a single scene of which—the underground railway—Boucicault and Augustin Daly fought in the United States courts for nearly a score of years. The drama requires elaborate and expensive scenic effects, an immense tank of real water being used for the Thames river scene. Another great scene shows the underground railway, with the fast mail train, "The Flying Scotchman," dashing across the stage at lightning speed.

Falke and Semon return to the Orpheum after an absence of five years, direct from London, where they made a hit with their dialogue act and playing upon odd instruments. Charles Ernest, singer and talker, will make his first appearance in this city; he works in black face. Marlo and Aldo, triple horizontal bar gymnasts whose specialties are straight and twisting somersaults from the first to third bar over the centre, will also be new. Juliet Wood and Fred Ray will make their initial San Francisco appearance in "A Funny Bunch of Nonsense." For their third and last week Frederic Bond and company will present for the first time on any stage a novel burletta in one act, "Rehearsing a Tragedy," suggested by a scene from Richard Brinsley's classic comedy, "The Critic," and the East Indian prima donna will have new operatic selections.

At the Chutes will be George and Laura Lewis, the "two Rubes," in a new and amusing sketch; John Le Clair, comedy juggler; Anderson and Wallace in a new travesty and the Reese brothers in their gun and spear manipulating turn, Henry Clive, the illusionist and May Lamson, the contralto.

MUSIC

[Communications addressed to this department should be received not later than Wednesday noon.]

O'Sullivan's Great Triumph

Denis O'Sullivan has either been taking vocal lessons from a competent teacher, or else he was not in proper voice or fettle on several occasions when he appeared in local theatres. At his concert in Steinway hall last Friday night it was hard to believe that it was the same O'Sullivan who sang in "Shamus O'Brien" at the Tivoli some years ago, and who later roused the wrath of sensitive Celts at the Grand Opera House. But perhaps Denis has two vocal organs—one for use in opera and Irish melodrama and the other for concert purposes. After hearing him Friday night it is easy to understand why the lusty young San Franciscan is so popular in London drawing-rooms. There are few singers capable of holding an audience throughout a whole evening, and arousing their hearers to such ecstasy as Denis O'Sullivan did last Friday evening. It was the greatest triumph he ever scored in this city, and it was a purely artistic one. The house was filled with his friends, but he needed no claque. He was in fine voice, and there was scarcely any suggestion of that tremolo that I have always regarded as fatal to his singing. The program was one that did great credit to his judgment, for it bespoke rare discretion. It was interspersed with dainty trifles, rattling ballads and charming folk-songs. He sang in German, Italian, Gaelic and English, and there was not a song that did not evoke tremendous applause, but it was his artistic rendition of the Irish ballads that aroused the greatest enthusiasm. His enunciation was clear, his phrasing excellent, and his tone production vindicated his training, but the secret of O'Sullivan's success as a concert singer is his wonderful power of expression. He acts his songs, and by means of his facial expression as well as by the eloquence of his tone makes his theme clear. The pathos of "The Wearing of the Green" never appealed to me as it did when sung by this dramatic vocalist, and never before was I so impressed by the exquisite humor of an Irish comic as when I heard him in the rollicking "Donovans" and "Widow Malone." Mr. O'Sullivan was fortunate in having for an accompanist that magnetic artist, Mr. Frederick Maurer Jr. Mr. Maurer is always en rapport with the vocalist whom he accompanies and his performance in the vocal interludes is a captivating feature of every concert in which he participates.

The Scheel Concert

An audience large enough and appreciative enough to delight the heart of any leader filled the Grand Opera House last Tuesday afternoon and listened to music large enough and beautiful enough to delight the heart of any audience. Week by week the work of the men under Mr. Scheel becomes more finished; week by week the ear of the music-loving public grows more responsive to fine effects. Consciously or unconsciously the man with his back to the audience is educating them; giving silent lectures on "How to Hear Good Music." In a really successful concert the leader must have his hearers as well in hand as his musicians. An indifferent audience may spoil the potentially best concert in the world. But no one with even half an ear, not the earless Elia himself, could be indifferent to such a rendering of such a program as Tuesday's. The music of Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" matches the matchless name, and Mr. Scheel's reading matched the music. No less beautiful are the first and second movements of the Brahms Symphonie; and no less delightful was the interpretation. Effective as was the "Parsifal," grateful as we are to hear it under any conditions, it none the less seemed almost out of place: one missed the setting, and the setting is "Parsifal." The "Finale" of the Handel "Grand Concerto" would have made the happiest possible ending; Rossini, as I heard it, came unpleasantly near being being an anticlimax.

The program for next Tuesday's symphony concert will be: Overture, "Corialanus," Beethoven; Haydn's symphony No. 5 in D. major; violin concerto op. 7, F sharp minor, Ernst; Serenade, op. 7, E flat major, Strauss; prelude (for strings), "The Last Dream of the Virgin," Massenet; "Lutspeil" overture, Von Reznicek. Of these the last three numbers will be new to us, the Richard Strauss serenade being of special interest. It requires the work of two flutes, two oboes, two clarinets, four horns, two bassoons and one contra bass. Mr. Otto Spamer, who will play the Ernst violin concerto with the orchestra, is a nephew of Wilhemj and a pupil of that great artist. The San Francisco public should wake up to the fact that this symphony season we are having is by no means an ordinary one. Scheel is giving us music that is new not only to us but to our Eastern cousins, and nearly as great a novelty to Europeans. Every concert gives us something absolutely new. The programs of the last two concerts of this series—September twenty-ninth and October sixth—will include especially interesting works of Tschaikowsky and others. H. J. Stewart's Montezuma Suite will be given at the seventh concert.

The Jewish Festival Music

Cantor Stark has been very busy during the past eight weeks preparing the music for the celebration of the Jewish high festivals at the Temple Emanu-El—September twenty-second, New Year, and October first, Day of Atonement. Most of the compositions to be given were composed by the Cantor, who has taken pains to preserve in them the characteristic spirit of the quaint old Hebrew melodies. The choir has been augmented for these festival services to twenty voices, and consists of only experienced singers. The members of the solo quartet are: Miss Daisy Cohn, soprano; Mrs. Helen Kelly, contralto; A. Vinson, tenor; Homer Henley, basso: W. A. Sabin, organist. An orchestra of twelve instruments will assist in the ensemble and solo numbers. The Cantor will conduct the ritual in the services, chant the national tunes and sustain the solo work of the baritone parts in the concerted numbers.

Tomorrow, at Holy Cross church, the anniversary of Holy Cross day will be celebrated. The organist, Harry Wood Brown, has provided some excellent music, and will himself sing the Recessional of Rudyard Kipling, music by Reginald DeKoven. Miss Sophie Rottanzi will sing the Inflammatus from "Stabat Mater" with full chorus and orchestra, and Marie Rottanzi will intone one of the Gregorian chants. Miss B. Peguillion, the regular contralto, will sing the Priestess song from "The Idol's Eye," arranged as an "O Salutaris," and Marcel Perron, the basso, will have a solo. Hayden's Imperial Mass in G will constitute the regular service, and the choir will be composed of Sophie Rottanzi, soprano; Testa Borondo, tenor; Miss B. Peguillion, contralto; Marcel Perron, bass; supplimented by Misses McLade, Laydon, Madden, sopranos; Marie Rottanzi, Lily Wilson, Gertrude Moran, contraltos; Messrs. Madden and Von Der Kim, bassos. The regular orchestra will officiate.

The usual monthly program of sacred music will be rendered at St. Dominic's church to-morrow evening, when the following will be given: Organ solo, Sonata No. 1, in D minor, Guilmant; soprano solo and chorus, "Hear My Prayer," Mendelssohn, Miss Camille Frank; tenor solo, "Ave Verum," Silas, T. G. Elliott; chorus, "Adoro Te," Dethier; organ solo, Air with variations (Septet) Beethoven; contralto solo, "The Holy Vision," Gounod. Miss Ella V. McCloskey; soprano solo, "Nearer, My God, to Thee," Stewart, Mrs. L. Snider Johnson; chorus, "Ave Verum," Walter Handel Thorley: At Benediction, "O Salutaris," Wagner; "Tantum Ergo," Delthier; postlude, Marche Triumphale, Guilmant. Dr. H. J. Stewart, organist and director of the choir.

A Newcomer

Mr. Theodor Salmon, who recently came to San Francisco from the East and established a studio at 546 Sutter street, is a pianist of considerable note. He was born at West Point, Iowa, his father being an orchestral conductor and his mother an amateur pianist of skill. He has a sister, Theresa Salmon, who has made name and fame as a concert pianist. After studying piano in this country and doing not a little concert work, Theodor Salmon went to Germany, where he studied under Kullak, Reinecke, Bruno Zwintscher, Jadassohn and the younger Richter. He has given concerts in New York and other large cities in this country and the critics everywhere give him high praise for his work.

Essays from Stanford

A most attractive little volume issued by Paul Elder and Company is a souvenir of "Antigone," the Greek play produced by the students and faculty of Stanford last year. The matter of the book consists of three essays: Professor W. H. Rolfe discourses of the production of the play in general, Professor A. T. Murray furnishes an analysis of Greek tragedy and of the "Antigone" in particular, and Professor Fairclough a dissertation on the Choral Side of "Antigone." These papers will be welcome reading to any one who is interested in the drama. The difference between an ancient and a modern play is so marked that the study is always a fascinating one. The classic tragedy was clean-cut, finished, statuesque; the modern drama—I can hardly say tragedy—is complex, shifting, indeterminate, the result in part of our manner of thinking, and in part of the greater liberty of construction allowed by disregarding the unities. A particularly interesting phase of the subject is the function of the chorus, and the part which music together with the dance played in the ensemble. Professor Fairclough's contribution to the literature already existing upon this subject will be found valuable. His concluding paragraph deserves studious attention: "The writer has recently witnessed in Rome M. Mounet-Sully's representation of the Oedipus Tyrannus, as given at the Comedie-Francaise in Paris. It was undoubtedly brilliant in some respects but I am convinced that the remark made by a cultivated spectator was just, viz.: that from such a performance one can learn much better what to avoid than what to imitate in presenting a Greek play. This is especially true of the lyrical element. In the French version the chorus practically disappears; the grand odes . . . are ruined by being delivered in weak melodrama by a single female voice, recitative and vocal melody are abandoned, and the result is a succession of dramatic scenes, which with their long speeches tend to become exceedingly monotonous, being unrelieved by the lyric color movement, and variety of tone, which the Greeks considered essential to a great tragedy." The mechanical execution of the book cannot be too highly commended. It is finely printed and illustrated with photographs. The cover is half vellum and the sole ornamentation is the title in Greek letters, gold on a background of dark green. Such simplicity and dignity of treatment convey a favorable impression even before the book is opened, and agree well with the character of the contents.

"Bachelor Bigotries"

This volume cannot be rightly laid at the door of the bachelor, since the title page informs us that they have been "compiled by an old maid, and approved by a young bachelor, illustrated by an ex-bachelor and published by a young married man."

"'Tis pleasant business making books,
When other people furnish brains," but the compilation of this volume, albeit pleasant, has been no idle task. The sayings have been culled from all sources, ancient and modern, from Juvenal to the last comic paper, and all are more or less biting. Fun and philosophy are both to be found, wit and wisdom in due proportion. There are three hundred and sixty-five quotations, one for each day in the year, so that the book answers the purpose of a calendar as well as "something to read." As samples of the contents, here are a few quotations selected at random:

"Man proposes and woman sues him for breach of promise"—John Eliot.

"Times have changed with him who marries: there are no more by-path meadows, wherein you may innocently linger, but the road lies long and straight and dusty, to the grave."—Stevenson.

"A woman is only a woman, but a good cigar is a smoke."—Kipling.

"Many a good hanging prevents a bad marriage."—Shakespeare.

"Early marriages were misery; imprudent marriages, idiotism, and marriage at the best," he was wont to say, with a kindling eye and a heightened color, "marriage at the best—was the devil."—Lytton.

"After forty men have married their habits, and wives are only an item in the list, and not the most important."—George Meredith.

"It is very beautiful to be in love, but it is a great relief to be out of it."—R. W. St. Hill.

"It's love that makes the world go round, but it's marriage that keeps most of the inhabitants hustling."—Puck.

"Woman is a bundle of pins, man her pincushion."—Henry Harland.

Illustrations are by A. F. Wilmarth, in black and scarlet, and consist of page margins, head and tail pieces, vignettes and full pages. The book is printed on Japanese paper of that soft yellowish tint so grateful to the eye, and bound in manila board with scarlet back. To local book lovers it would be sufficient to say that it is published by Paul Elder and Company, for that is guarantee for good workmanship and artistic appearance. "Bachelor Bigotries" ought to repeat the success of the "Cynic's Calendar." It is published at the moderate price of one dollar.

A Reporter's Tale

With "On Special Assignment" Samuel Travers Clover follows up the adventures of Paul Travers, who, in a previous volume, traveled around the world on an empty pocket with a view to fitting himself for a career as a newspaper reporter. Paul, who is now twenty-one, is installed at a desk in a Chicago newspaper office, and almost before he has sharpened his first pencil he becomes the most valuable man in the outfit, so he is put on special assignments, where he has a chance to see all that is going on and take part in all sorts of stirring adventures. He visits the Moqui Indians and sees the secret mysteries and preparations for the snake dances, reports an Indian uprising from the front, describes the Messiah craze and the ghost dances, and is in at the death when Sitting Bull is disposed of and later on joins in the cattle rustlers' warfare in Wyoming, all in the interests of his paper. To those of the coming generation who are interested in these events the book will prove interesting, but one cannot but hope that the kid reporter had more knowledge of the accurate use of words than the author himself displays. In describing the eagerness of a man to escape from what he considers a position of danger, Mr. Glover tells us that he "threw a trouser-leg over the taffrail," and when a vessel is launched he speaks of her sliding down the ways as "a landslide." Again, in describing a wreck on a dark, stormy night, when the doomed vessel was driven ashore, he tells us "her masts could be seen with the naked eye" when it is evident that they could almost be touched with the naked hand. It was not an application to the eye that was needed but light to dispel the darkness. Grab and grasp are not synonymous terms, either, nor would "internal injuries produced by a blow on the temple" be regarded as an accurate description. Also, one may safely take exception to his statement that the entire wealth of an Indian family was "hung on a parallel pole." How can one pole be parallel? Then he describes the Custer massacre, where every officer and man was annihilated, as a "decimating battle." These are a few specimens of loose diction picked at random, but the narrative abounds with them, though we are told time and again that it was the purity and precision of his language which made the chief charm of the young reporter's style. We have become accustomed to this sort of slipshodness since a generation of authors has grown up who know not grammar, or analysis, or parsing, or synonyms, or many other things with which their fathers were familiar. In writing books for boys there is need to exercise special care in these matters, and if, as Mr. Glover tells us, Paul Travers is to become managing editor, it is to be hoped that he will not only learn betimes, but insist that his subordinates will exercise due care in the selection and use of words. D. Lothrop is the publisher of the volume, which is illustrated by Laskey. —The Bookworm.

Mr. Edward Xavier Rolker has returned from Colorado Springs, and has reopened his studio at 910 Sutter street. He is making preparations for a recital by some of his pupils early in October.

Rossini composed almost constantly and in all ways, rarely at the piano, most often in the evening or at night, and like Mozart, often found inspiration in a carriage or post chaise. In the irregular jolting of these vehicles he perceived rhythm, and of these rhythms melodies were born. There is no doubt that he would have found them in the trepidation of the railroad, if he had dared to try, but he had such a dread of this mode of locomotion that no one was ever able to induce him to set foot in a car.

It is perhaps not generally known that the chorus of the Birmingham festival in England consists almost entirely of paid singers. Out of one hundred and twenty sopranos there are only about a baker's dozen of unpaid amateurs, while among the tenors all but one man are paid.

Massenet has another American protegee, to succeed Sybil Sanderson. Her name is Courtenay Thomas and she has been singing at the Opera Comique, Paris, for seven years. "Le Cherubim" is said to be the title of the opera Massenet has composed for Miss Thomas, to be produced in November.

W. S. Gilbert is said to be again writing for the operatic stage. Though several times reported as dying, the veteran librettist is still much alive. It is forty-five years since he became known as a writer. "Pinafore" was written in 1876.

J. F. Veaco, the well-known tenor, has entirely recovered from his recent attack of bronchitis. He has resumed teaching at his studio, 1173 Green street. Mr. Veaco is singing at the First Unitarian church now in addition to his other engagements.

During Dr. Carl's recent visit here he entertained at luncheon at the Palace Mr. Louis C. Eaton, organist of Trinity church. The New York organist visited many points of interest in California, taking in Tahoe, Tamalpais and other show-places.

Siegfried Wagner's new opera, "The Gnome," will be produced in Leipsic this month.

A Limerick Cycle of Easy Authorship

A certain young author named Pondo
Of his typewriter grew very fond oh,—
He just had so much
As to give it a touch
And 'twould bang off a sonnet or rondeau.

He could write with his fingers and toes
Love lyrics or fictional prose.
He could work, if he tried.
With his feet and hands tied,
For he'd learned to compose with his nose.

Said a friend, in astonishment blinking,
"I should think this would drive you to drinking."
Quoth the author, "Not so,—
I'm quite idle, you know,
For my typewriter does all the thinking."

So I wish, when my Muse waxes wheezy,
That my typewriter's style were more breezy,
That it worked in a way
To make poetry pay
And authorship pleasant and easy.

The Quest of Temperament

"Where did you receive your musical education?" asked the impresario.

The question was put to a beautiful young woman who had made application to join his company as prima donna.

"I received it in Europe," was the reply.

"Who was your vocal instructor?"

"I didn't have any vocal instructor. You see, I went over for temperament. I was told in San Francisco that my voice was all right but that I would have to live and acquire experience before I could become great; that it would be necessary to experience the wild swell of passion, the bitterness of disappointment, the tender joy of hope, the fierce desire for love, the ecstasy of romantic achievement, and all that sort of thing."

"And what sort of success did you have?" asked the impresario.

"Fairly good. The first month I was in Paris a French count shot himself in my boudoir. A little later I married an artist, and in three weeks he applied for a divorce on account of my flirtations with an American millionaire. After my divorce I was made co-respondent in a suit brought by the wife of a Russian musician, and then I eloped to this country with an Italian prince."

"I guess you'll do," said the impresario, and he produced a blank contract. —The Satirist.

"Why was the engagement broken off?"

"Well, you see, her father objected because his salary wasn't large enough, and his mother objected because her parents were of humble origin."

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO STATE OF CALIFORNIA

Department No. 7. No. 87243

ALFRED H. COATES, Plaintiff, vs. EMMA C. COATES, Defendant. } Action brought in the Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and the Complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said Superior Court.

The People of the State of California send Greeting to:

EMMA C. COATES, Defendant.

YOU ARE HEREBY REQUIRED to appear in an action brought against you by the above-named Plaintiff in the Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and to answer the Complaint filed therein within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this Summons, if served within this County; or if served elsewhere, within thirty days.

The said action is brought to obtain a judgment and decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony now existing between plaintiff and defendant, upon the ground of defendant's willful desertion of said plaintiff for more than one year prior to the commencement of this action and upon the ground of defendant's extreme cruelty to plaintiff as appears from the complaint on file herein to which special reference is hereby made; also for general relief, as will more fully appear in the Complaint on file, to which special reference is hereby made.

All of which will more fully appear in the Complaint on file herein to which you are hereby referred.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said Complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief therein demanded.

(SEAL) GIVEN under my hand and seal of said Superior Court at the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, this 8th day of September, in the year of our Lord, one thousand nine hundred and three.

Maurice Wolfe, representing the Olds Company recently sold the machine he was driving to "Big Mouth," a Sioux chieftain, who lives on the Sioux agency, near Billings, Montana. Mr. Wolfe headed a procession composed of nearly all the Indians, squaws and papooses on the agency, when he entered Billings in his runabout. "Big Mouth" would not look at first, but when it was driven over to his house he condescended to accompany Mr. Wolfe on a spin around the outskirts of the town. During a ten-mile ride he became interested enough to ask if Mr. Wolfe's car "wouldn't go better on the track." The chief thought it was a new brand of locomotive. After it was explained to him that no track was needed, that it ate no grass like a pony, nor coal like a locomotive, but was easily satisfied with a little "medicine water" from the agency, and was shown that it could travel much faster and farther than a horse; that it could carry two riders; that it never "bucked" or shied; that it could travel through a prairie-dog village without stumbling, Mr. "Big Mouth" was anxious to buy it. He reached inside his buckskin shirt, drew out a tobacco pouch filled with gold and greenbacks and said, "Guess buy him. How much?" But before the purchase money was paid over Mr. Wolfe had to have the auto painted at his own expense, the brightest red that could be found in Billings.

Local automobilists have at length settled the question as to the identity of the first man who entered the Yosemite Valley in an automobile; also of the one who made the first successful trip into the valley. Three years ago Oliver Lippincott entered the Yosemite in a Locomobile. The trip, however, could not be called a successful one, for Lippincott's machine was hauled up to Glacier Point by team, and it was also hauled out of the valley. However, Lippincott was the first to enter it. The first automobilist to successfully tour the Yosemite without the aid of man or beast was Major J. Fulmer of Los Angeles, who entered in July of this year in a Cadillac.

Where an automobile won't go no man may say. Whether it will ever be used for Alpine climbing is another question; but after the experience of Mr. John B. Kelly on Mount Hood, it would not be a matter of great surprise to hear that some man had attempted to climb the Matterhorn with an auto. Mr. Kelly used a "White" steam carriage and went three-fourths of the distance to the summit. The actual point reached was about two thousand feet from the snow line, which is at present at its highest point. Mr. Kelly is the first man who ever made the ascent. The gate-keeper at the government camp, in issuing him the permit to pass, assured him of this fact, expressing surprise that he had succeeded. He was accompanied on the down trip by Mrs. Kelly and their five children, who had been camping on the mountain for several days. The machine also conveyed most of their camp equipage. "With all due respect to beautiful Mount Hood, the trip was quite easy," declared Mr. Kelly last evening. "I have always thought that an automobile could get up there without any trouble and so I decided to bring my family home in the machine. I made the run up a couple of days ago. There would not have been any difficulty but for the huge boulders in the road. The slope was so steep in some places that the front wheels would tilt from the ground for a moment, but the machine kept right on going, although it was necessary to keep up about five hundred pounds pressure."

Three automobile races were held at San Jose on Admission Day. The National Automobile Company's horseless carriage captured first honors in the three-mile runabout for gasoline machines only. Fred C. Hotaling's Winton driven by Selby Hewson, the machine that was victorious at Del Monte, won the five-mile race for gasoline machines of 20-horse power or under. So that the White touring cars (steam vehicles) could also race a five-mile, open to machines of all kinds, was arranged, but when the White car with H. D. Ryus was ready to start there were no others and the speedy touring vehicle went around the five miles alone.

The Pioneer Automobile Company reports sales of Oldsmobiles to the following persons last week: Mr. Cassell of Palo Alto, Shelley Pickles of Monterey, Mr. Kendall of Lodi, Messrs. Gordon and Catherwood of Eureka, Mr. Patterson of Centerville, F. S. Jacks of Napa, the Ratto Brothers of San Francisco, Dr. Ward of Woodland, Messrs. Merrill and Hansen of Stockton.

Stevens-Duryeas sold last week: Lillie Brothers of Lodi, Frank Moore of Stockton, George Strong of Oakland and C. C. Moore of San Francisco.

National Automobile Company sold machines to Mrs. Russell Cool, Mason Harris, A. Muhs, Mrs. Retterach and Frank O'Brien of Willows.

Sales of the Pacific Motor Car Company: Ivan Treadwell a Packard and an order taken from R. P. Greer for a St. Louis tonneau.

The White Sewing Machine Company sold cars to H. E. Williamson of Stockton and John A. Benson of this city.

At a meeting held last week of the Automobile Club of California it was decided to hold the big race meet at the Ingleside track on Saturday and Sunday, November the seventh and eighth.

William R. Hearst has had his 40-horse power imported French Mors shipped out here and will tour the State during his visit.

Aquarelles au Naturel

On Labor Monday a party of Eastern tourists visited the Tavern on Tamalpais. One of the company was reading from the circular setting forth the beauties of the inn: "The dining-room is furnished in natural wood, with polished hardwood floors, and handsomely tinted walls and ceiling." The others gazed at the "tinted" walls, to which some unintended additions were evident owing to a leaky roof during the last rain-storm. It inspired one of the men in the party to add:

"I wonder why they did not call attention to the wonderful water-colors?"

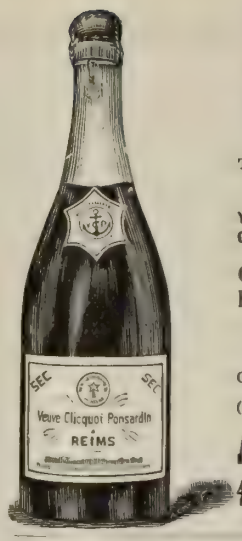
How Some Fashions Originated



The fillet came into vogue, after the Greek girls who wore it passed away, in the following manner: There was a haughty lady who lived in the seventeenth century. She had the king tied around her finger, and one day when she was in a royal hunting party the wind blew her pretty hair about and threatened her head-dress. Just as the other ladies were hoping a head-dress awry would ruin her she took off her ribbon garter and tied it around her head, and she looked so tremendously fetching that the king was more in love than ever. Thus the fashion was set at once. Queen Anne originated the idea of wearing a collar of large pearls, clasped closely about her neck, to disguise its inartistic contour. Queen Alexandra, because of a skin disease, covered her throat with the high stock collar that has continued in vogue for so many years. Madame Modjeska introduced the bodice which coming closely about the throat was cut out in a large angle over the chest, and at once found favor with women having prominent collar-bones. The fashion of wearing a lace handkerchief peeping out from a corsage came from the frills of the chemise displayed by the Parisian demi-monde. American women in Paris and everywhere outrage custom, and adopt styles for no reason but because they admire them, and they seized upon this at once and sent it to their New York friends who passed it along the fashion route. The Gainsborough hat fad, since modified into the picture hat, also emanated from the Paris half-world. A famous beauty, the bel ami of an artist, once for a jest wore his huge slouch hat in her drive along the boulevard. The hat was pronounced tres chic by the smart women who observed it, and the Parisian milliners had to rush to supply the demand for these huge hats. —The Modiste.

BESSIE H. MITCHELL, Plaintiff
vs.
JAMES MITCHELL, Defendant

Action brought in the Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and the Complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said Superior Court.

The People of the State of California send Greeting to:

JAMES MITCHELL, Defendant

YOU ARE HEREBY REQUIRED to appear in an action brought against you by the above-named Plaintiff, in the Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and to answer the Complaint filed therein within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this Summons, if served within this County; or if served elsewhere, within thirty days.

The said action is brought to obtain a judgment and decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony now existing between plaintiff and defendant, upon the ground of defendant's wilful neglect to provide for plaintiff the common necessaries of life because of his idleness, profligacy and dissipation, also on the ground of defendant's infidelity to plaintiff; also for general relief, as will more fully appear in the Complaint on file, to which special reference is hereby made.

All of which will more fully appear in the Complaint on file herein to which you are hereby referred.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said Complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief therein demanded.

vs.
ADDIE LINTON, Defendant

Action brought in the Superior Court City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and the Complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said Superior Court.

The People of the State of California send Greeting to:

ADDIE LINTON, Defendant.

YOU ARE HEREBY REQUIRED to appear in an action brought against you by the above-named Plaintiff in the Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and to answer the Complaint filed therein within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this Summons, if served within this County; or if served elsewhere, within thirty days.

The said action is brought to obtain a judgment and decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony now existing between plaintiff and defendant, upon the ground of defendant's desertion of plaintiff; also for general relief, as will more fully appear in the Complaint on file, to which special reference is hereby made.

All of which will more fully appear in the Complaint on file herein to which you are hereby referred.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said Complaint as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief therein demanded.

Those Journalistic Fakers

An authentic account of the incidents of the recent Conclave at which Pope Pius X was elected has at length been made public. The account is based on authority which, according to the New York Sun, "bears all the marks of authenticity," and it also substantiates all that was asserted at the time by Town Talk, in contradiction of the absurd reports published by the daily newspapers. The readers of this paper will remember that we stigmatized as false and ridiculous the statements of the newspaper correspondents concerning the political wire-pulling of the Cardinals; that we asserted that the Conclave would not concede the right of any nation to exercise a veto power, and that the next Pope would in all probability be one of the humblest members of the College, and one who was most reluctant to accept the tiara. According to the authority which the Sun endorses Rampolla, the man who was represented by the dailies to be the most strenuous of all the political Cardinals and the most eager to become Pope, contributed one of the two votes that were given to Sarto on the first ballot. Moreover he voted for Sarto every time, and when the latter recognized that the voting was steadily bearing him into the shadow of the tiara, he implored his fellow Cardinals with tears in his eyes not to lay upon him a burden for which he felt himself unfitted. And the same authority tells us that it was this extraordinary humility thus exhibited that contributed as much as anything else to raise the Patriarch of Venice to the throne of Peter. It has also been learned that when the announcement was made that Austria would veto the election of Rampolla, there was great indignation among the Cardinals, and on the next ballot the Papal Secretary of State received his highest vote. This was regarded as a formal repudiation of the veto and the deduction was drawn that the privilege had been exercised for the last time. Throughout the Conclave Rampolla pleaded incessantly for the election of Sarto, and it was largely through his influence that Pope Pius X was elected. The day after the election the dailies announced that Rampolla would be immediately removed from the office of Secretary of State, the intimation being that he was not esteemed by the new Pope. The files of Town Talk show that we branded that statement as false, and declared that Rampolla would hold office until he requested that his successor be appointed. He is still Secretary of State, and though he is anxious to resign the cares and responsibilities of the office, Pope Pius X has prevailed upon him to continue in the service of the church. Though he was the most influential man in the Conclave he scarcely had influence enough to prevent his friends from thrusting the tiara upon him, notwithstanding the veto of Austria. The inaccuracies of the dailies are not adverted to through any desire to exalt our own achievement in presenting a true picture of the situation in Rome at the time of the Conclave, but for the purpose of calling attention to the utter unreliability of the men who supply this country with news of European affairs. When it became known that Pope Leo was dying all the leading foreign correspondents were sent to Rome to prepare for the great historic events that were impending. Many of the dailies have since boasted of the wonderful service that was rendered by those up-to-date journalists, and it now appears that they indulged principally in guess-work, and that their gross ignorance of the Catholic Church and its traditions led them into all sorts of errors. Their reports were colored upon the theory that the church dignitaries of today were afflicted with the same infirmities of temperament by which they were obsessed in mediæval times. Many of those brilliant correspondents who were gathered in Rome at the time of the Conclave are now reporting the progress of affairs in Turkey, and some are in London disseminating news of the political crisis in that country. They probably know as much about what they are reporting as they knew about the situation in Rome a few months ago. If a local reporter missed the truth half as often as they do in the course of a week, he wouldn't be able to get a job in town.

An Important Economic Principle

The question of the right of employers to take or to discharge employes as individuals, regardless of their affiliation or non-affiliation with labor organizations, is an issue upon which the special aims of labor-unionism must stand or fall. It was asserted as a sound economic principle in the findings of the Anthracite Coal Strike Commission, President Roosevelt has lately given it his unqualified endorsement in a letter over his own signature, and a second endorsement now appears in the decisions of umpire Carroll D. Wright in cases submitted for his determination. The principle has yet no binding force in law. It merely has the moral effect of high authoritative judgment. A non-union man who may be discharged as a result of the influence of open or covert threats made by unionists has no redress, but the principle is certainly destined to be woven into the law upon our statute books. The club of unionism has been so recklessly wielded of late that it has become a constant menace to industrial peace, and though there is no objection to labor organization for the purpose of improving the condition and the status of wage earners, public sentiment has become quite strong in its protest against the claim of unionism to the right to dictate to the employer in the matter of his employes. It is regarded as in contravention of the fundamental principles of our Government as expressed in the Declaration of Independence.

A Plea for the Little Ones

In all the clamor and clatter over the bond issue the main stress is laid on the necessity for schools. It is a necessity which no one will deny, but the people would, perhaps, take a greater interest in the matter if the discussion were confined to the need for accommodation for the small children. Incidentally we are reminded that the littlest boys and girls are crowded into unsuitable and unsanitary makeshift class-rooms, but the plans and pictures are all for the other end of the educational ladder. There is plenty of gush about the need of playgrounds for "growing children," but not for the little chaps who have no place but the streets in which to play ball when an accommodating policeman turns his back, and who are too small to belong to athletic clubs or journey to the playground in the Park. It is the more mature lads, destined to join the university elevens, and to become golf and tennis champions and heroes of the cinder path, who are being considered. The little fellows must wait. Time enough for them to exercise their limbs and fill their lungs when they are big and strong enough to walk across the peninsula. It is a far cry to the time when their brawn will count in an intercollegiate game, and until then, why waste schoolyards on them? There are objections enough to be urged against the Lowell high school and any number of other schools, built on the sidewalk lines of noisy streets in unsuitable localities, but most of these buildings are of yesterday as compared with the Marshall Primary, built in the late fifties, moved to the rear of a small lot and propped up on stilts, or the Hawthorne, erected in the middle sixties, and added to and patched till it resembles a shower of houses. There are any number of others which are as old and unsuitable. When a new building goes up, the larger, older pupils are removed and the infants fall heirs to the old barrack. If there is an unusual amount spent on a building, it is sure to be for the benefit of the high school pupils, and some grammar school takes the cast-off. The old desks and worn apparatus are good enough for the youngest classes, while the newest and best are for the grown-ups. It is a theory of esthetes that children should be accustomed to beauty from their earliest years, when their minds are most impressionable. Small wonder that, in spite of natural advantages, San Francisco is one of the ugliest municipalities on the face of the globe, when the small children are first sent to dilapidated old barracks which they must reach through tunnels and alleys, and later, are promoted to dry goods boxes set on the street edge. Give the little ones a chance at the best modern structures, with plenty of play space, and let the athletes of the upper classes exercise themselves with the broom, the wood pile and the back yard at home.

Brain Power Needed

While in this country there is fear that too many people are seeking to avoid the drudgery of hard work by fitting themselves for the professions, the complaint has been made in England that there is not enough brain power. Sir Norman Lockyer, president of the British Association for the Advancement of Science, proclaims that Englishmen are not educated enough to keep up with the procession, and that they will fall farther behind unless better means of education are provided. "We in Great Britain," says this eminent authority, "have eleven universities competing with one hundred and thirty-four, state and privately endowed in the United States, and twenty-two, state endowed in Germany. The German State gives to one university more than the British Government allows to all the universities and university colleges in England, Ireland, Scotland and Wales put together." Sir Norman Lockyer has sounded a note of warning that his complacent countrymen have heard with alarm. Since the publication of the findings of the War Commission, Englishmen are prepared to believe that there is something radically wrong, and they will no doubt be willing to accept the diagnosis of the distinguished scientist, for it is beyond dispute that ignorance and incompetence are responsible for the shameful conduct of affairs in South Africa. As Lord Methuen has said, it must have been the Colonials who kept the Empire off the rocks. The army is badly in need of men who use their brains.

Exposing Professional Tricks

That was a very unfair advantage that Garrett McEnerney took of a brother attorney the other day, in open court. Mr. McEnerney was engaged in probating a will whose authenticity was questioned by an attorney named Splivalo. The latter undertook to prove that all of the will was not in the handwriting of the decedent; that certain words, without which it would have been invalid, were written in several days after the filing of the will. It happened that Mr. McEnerney had taken the precaution to have the will photographed before filing, and also to have the photographs certified. Mr. Splivalo knew not of the photographs. He was as innocent as a babe of the existence of the incontrovertible evidence of the fact that the disputed line was in the will when the document was filed. So he mounted the witness stand, took a solemn oath to tell the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth, and swore that he saw the will several days after it was put on record, and that it did not contain the words which constituted the question at issue. Mr. McEnerney questioned him closely to give him an opportunity to hedge, but Mr. Splivalo was in no hedging mood. He was intent on breaking that will, and he scorned to testify in equivocal language. As an attorney he knew the value of positive testimony, and to strengthen his case and insure his fee he clinched the matter by calling his son and his law clerk to give corroborating evidence. They too saw the will after it was filed, and they also remarked the fatal omission. And to make assurance doubly sure Mr. D. T. Ames, a handwriting expert, was called as a witness. He examined the alleged forgery and he was quite sure that it was not in the handwriting of the deceased. Meanwhile Mr. McEnerney, who had set the trap, was gloating inwardly. He was like the gambler who has a few aces up his sleeve, and is waiting his opportunity to slip them into the game. When the witnesses had sworn themselves to the limit, and the other side had exposed its hand, he produced his little photographs and raked in the judgment. It was discourteous on Mr. McEnerney's part thus to trap a brother attorney and expose to the light of day some of the tricks of the profession by which frauds are perpetrated in the courts of the city. It is a maxim of the profession in San Francisco that wills are made to be broken. There is a branch of the profession devoted to the looting of estates, and it is pretty generally understood that heirs have no rights which lawyers are bound to respect. Under the circumstances it appears that Mr. McEnerney has been guilty of a gross breach of professional etiquette. His expose of the methods of the will-breaker should be construed to be in restraint of profitable litigation. Mr. Splivalo should petition the Supreme Court for his disbarment.

The Scribbler's Lament

The cry of the children of literature still goes up from England, and it is exceeding bitter. A recent correspondent of the Boston Transcript says the condition of those who depend on their pens for a livelihood is pitiable, and not understood by any but the sufferers themselves. According to this writer novelists whose names apparently stand for fame and fortune are on the verge of actual starvation. Vizitelly died in a workhouse, Rhoda Broughton is penniless and Justin McCarthy is glad to accept a pension. Another novelist whose name is withheld, but who, we are assured, is by no means unknown, says that if the book he is to publish now does not succeed he will have no alternative but the workhouse. And all this is blamed primarily on Sir Walter Besant and his optimistic invitation to the butcher, the baker and the candlestick maker, to come on and write. It was easier, he averred, than rolling off a log. All that was needed was a penny bottle of ink, a few pens and a quire of paper. There was a time when the Society of Authors was remarkably successful and good prices were obtainable from publishers, but it has passed and publishers cast gloomy eyes into the future. There is little use in publishing books which will not sell and there is no means to compel people to buy. One dealer blames bridge for the falling off of trade. He complains that it is easier to dispose of five hundred packs of cards than of two books, but the general opinion is that overproduction of mediocre books, and free libraries, are at the root of the depression. However the disgruntled novelists do not lay down their pens and take up some other implement. Why should they be any more helpless than the artisan who finds himself left out in the cold because a machine has superseded the hand? Writers take themselves entirely too seriously. The man who can see no middle course between writing books no one wants to read, and going to the public workhouse, is about as useful in one place as in another.

The Important Corset

Miss Elizabeth A. C. White, president of the Dressmakers' Protective Association, has been talking again. Miss White differs from most women who talk for publication in that she never rocks her tongue in her chin-cradle unless she has something to say. And when she gives utterance to her views her sex hearkens, for she always discusses a subject dear to every female heart and with which she is familiar. It is the subject of the female form divine. Miss White is a crank on the corset and she loves to expatiate on how it should not be worn. Last year, when the Dressmakers' Protective Association met, several of the members who take themselves seriously undertook to decree what the styles for the coming season should be, but Miss White wasted no time on that subject. She knew that the fashions would come from Paris as usual, and that no convention of American dressmakers could usurp the functions of the Parisian modistes. So she devoted herself to her hobby, and sought to enlighten her sex on the uses and abuses of that most important article in the paraphernalia of the toilet known as the straight-front corset. She challenged contradiction of the proposition that it is impossible for a woman to have a stylish figure without a straight-front corset properly adjusted. And then she made the astounding assertion that only about one woman in every one hundred knows how to get into a corset properly. She said that she was constantly meeting women on the street whom she would like to drag into doorways to readjust their corsets. At this year's convention Miss White demonstrated her methods on models, and is said to have shown that it was possible by correct corseting to impart grace to an awkward figure. She ought to quit dressmaking and take to the lecture platform. Anybody who can show women with awkward figures how to create graceful lines without resorting to hip-pads, quilted skirts and fictitious busts should be able to reap a golden harvest in the lecture field. That the sex has learned to do wonderful things with the corset there is not the slightest doubt. Before the straight-front garment came into use it was customary for women to compress their diaphragm and force up their bust in a manner that was highly injurious. In those days they adjusted the figure to the corset, and having laced the garment once they forced themselves into it ever after, never loosening the laces or changing the size except if a reduction appeared feasible. Now we are told by the exponents of higher fashion that the the corset is unlaced as well as unclasped every night and readjusted in the morning. The pressure is no longer over the diaphragm, and there is no contortion of the bust, and yet there is no evidence of embonpoint. Indeed the straight-front corset is a boon to the woman with a high stomach. It has received the unqualified endorsement of that great singing teacher, Madame Marchesi, who says that she wonders how women who used to compress their diaphragm in the old days were ever able to sing. It is also a boon to the woman who affected those hideous excrescences known as hip-pads, though, according to Miss White, they are still worn by women who do not know how to corset themselves, and who imagine that they cannot be detected afar off. But this is a subject that profane man can hardly be expected to discuss intelligently. It involves mysteries that he cannot hope to solve, and which are as an open book to Miss White.

The Wild Joy of Living

BY HARRY COWELL

When Walter Pater, with that over-niceness of conscience that has characterized more than one modern Pagan, decided to omit from the second edition of "The Renaissance" the famous "Conclusion," afterward reprinted, conceiving that "it might possibly mislead some of those young men into whose hands it might fall," he no doubt forgot for the moment that the spirit of the times was whispering the substance of his suppressed thoughts into the eager ears of young men—ay, and young women, too—the western world over. Tens of thousands who read "To burn always with this hard, gemlike flame, to maintain this ecstasy, is success in life," recognized immediately their own private view of the whole matter set forth in a happy sentence. What was it that they, too, had long been on the point of expressing? Nothing less than this: "While all melts under our feet, we may well catch at any exquisite passion, or any contribution to knowledge that seems by a lifted horizon to set the spirit free for a moment, or any stirring of the senses, strange dyes, strange colors, and curious odors, or work of the artist's hands, or the face of one's friend." Often and often they had felt—though they had never been quite able to formulate it—that "not to discriminate every moment some passionate attitude in those about us, and in the brilliancy of their gifts some tragic dividing of forces on their way, is, on this short day of frost and sun, to sleep before evening." In short, after the manner of the "Conclusion," had they also concluded, and so found therein but their own secret thoughts nobly expressed, what was vague and void in their own souls given beautiful form.

Through the white, transparent words of Walter Pater flames the figure of the spirit of the age. Whether it is that the spread of scientific education has quickened the "sense of the splendour of our experience and of its awful brevity" or that the will to live has in some indeterminable way received an added impulse, I know not; but this I do know: that today men and women are everywhere repeating to themselves and even to each other: "We have an interval and then our place knows us no more. . . . Our one chance lies in expanding that interval, in getting as many pulsations as possible into the given time." I do know that classes that for centuries have been content with existence are now clamoring for life; that back of the unrest running through society is the belief that this day and hour should yield its due measure of golden emotions. There is a reaching out after experience. The granddaughters of women who drowsed away their days stand in the stress of thought and would fain know life even as men know it. People of every rank may be heard crying out with the poet:

> "'Tis life, whereof our nerves are scant,
> O life, not death, for which we pant;
> More life, and fuller, that I want."

There is a momentous readiness on the part of women to pay whatever price Fate—that driver of hard bargains—may demand of them if only they may see the desire of their souls and be satisfied. Many a woman is more than willing to pluck the rose of love regardless of the cruellest possible thorn. No one is ashamed of having passions. Not to be able to feel intensely calls for an apology. Dry-As-Dust has nowadays hardly a solitary disciple left. The deferring of delight is no longer the virtue it used to be.

To think that this determination on the part of life to live is essentially immoral is to think the thing that is not. Those who interpret the times in decadent terms are but superficial seers. Frail as the race of man undoubtedly is, the cause of frailty has had but few defenders. There are no end of fine scruples abroad. The thought-saving system of deciding questions of conduct according to convention is not as satisfactory as it once was. It requires no great powers of observation to see that a desire to live beautifully almost invariably accompanies the desire to live intensely.

To shirk life is easy enough and far from being meritorious. What aforetime often passed for the very high-water mark of morality was nothing more than a systematic and successful attempt to abstain from living. But to do much and do it rightly, to live and live well, is difficult indeed.

Where there is much living, there are naturally many mistakes. The sin of omitting to live is, however, the supreme mistake. To say that the soul is here for the sake of experience may miss the white of Truth, but many a shot of famous marksmen has gone wider. And one gains more experience by going into business—becoming bankrupt, even, and starting all over again—than by putting one's talent in the napkin of do-nothingism.

To go without something greatly desired because Circumstance asks you to pay therefor a little pain, is cowardly. Put your hand into your pocket and pay up like a man, and see if you don't enjoy your purchase all the more because it cost a trifle extra.

To know all that is to be known, to feel all that is to be felt, would take infinitely more time than three score years and ten. Old or young, head and heart must die hungry. None the less will a wise man wrestle with the angel of each passing moment for all the blessing the winged thing is capable of bestowing.

The potential gladness that goes to waste in this world is sadder to think on than all the sorrow that makes life gray. Like Ruskin, I weep, not over what men suffer, but over what they miss—the sky they fail to appreciate, or the love, or the art. But after all, is it not a matter for smiles to remember that life is potentially, if not actually, happy?

Lane's Sensational Letter

At this writing (Wednesday) it is doubtful whether Franklin K. Lane will consent to run for Mayor of this city. In a letter to the Democratic Convention which nominated him last Tuesday night, he announced that he would not be the candidate of the Democracy unless the nomination came "as the demand of a united party." As nearly one-half the delegates voted against Mr. Lane, and as the convention declined to make the nomination unanimous, even after the leader of the opposition was requested to do so, he would stultify himself most ridiculously if he were to make his insincerity manifest by deciding to run. Of course the convention may reconsider its action, and make the nomination unanimous. But to change the temper of disgruntled delegates it will be necessary to appease the minority by giving it the recognition that it demands. And that is probably what Mr. Lane will seek to have done. Indeed his letter is regarded in some quarters as a grandstand play made for the purpose of enabling him to come in at the eleventh hour, pour oil on the troubled waters, and pose as the great benefactor of the Democracy who bridged an ugly chasm and reunited a divided party.

His Charming Modesty

Others are of the opinion that he wrote the letter in one of his fits of megalomania; that he wished to strike an heroic pose, thinking that the magnetism of his name was such that it would spellbind the convention, and that when it became known that there was a possibility of the party's losing him the delegates would stampede for him and make the nomination unanimous. The egoism of the letter gives color to this theory. He said among other things, "I would go into this fight, if at all, for no personal reasons, but out of a high sense of duty to my party and a still higher sense of the obligation I am under to the people of this city who have so signally honored me at other times and who have the right to call upon me for any service I can render." Wouldn't it be interesting to know what meat this Cæsar has been feeding upon? I am rather surprised at Mr. Lane's modesty in merely stipulating that the Democracy should be united, for it is evident that he feels that the people of the whole city are concerned about his political future. He clearly states that if he run it will be out of deference to the people of the city. In other words he feels that the obligation is mutual, for he would not run if he did not think the people of San Francisco were in need of his valuable services. Did ever a job-chaser exhibit such conceit before?

Ruef on Honor

After the convention adjourned Tuesday night efforts were made by all the daily newspapers to interview Mr. Lane and ascertain whether he would accept the nomination, coming as it did from a divided convention, but he could not be found. Communication was had with his home, but his whereabouts were unknown to his family. The supposition is that he was under cover, being unprepared to answer until he received advice from his mentor, Gavin McNab. The situation was an embarrassing one to the Democracy and it excited speculation around town as to the outcome. The consensus of opinion, however, was that Lane would run. Meanwhile the Republican bosses who had decided upon nominating Henry J. Crocker, were exuberant over the complications that had arisen in the Democracy. They expect to battle in the coming campaign over a clean-cut issue between labor unionism and capital, and they are confident of the support of all that conservative element in the community which has become disgusted with the reign of the McCarthys and the Caseys. They believe that Crocker will be able to poll the Republican vote, and that Schmitz will draw from the Democracy. But they are not without troubles of their own. That shifty individual, Abe Ruef, has been keeping them guessing. He is said to be in doubt as to what is the honorable course for him to pursue as between Schmitz and the Republican candidate. The spectacle of Ruef soliloquizing on a question of honor has added greatly to the gayety of the campaign. I have heard it suggested that Mr. Spreckels could determine the matter for Abe by invoking the same subtle influence that was brought to bear two years ago when Ruef decided to promote the interests of the Primary League.

Those Stolen Letters

Deputy Sheriff Dasha, who is implicated in the Chinese substitution frauds, is a man who is said to be able to be able to shed considerable light on all the facts pertaining to the looting of an estate in Judge Troutt's court for which "Happy Jack" Chretien was sent to San Quentin. "Young Dutchy" who was involved in that affair had in his possession some valuable letters which are said to have passed between Chretien and another attorney. The letters disappeared. I have heard that they fell into the possession of Dasha, and that he turned them over to a Republican boss of the south side who destroyed them.

Miss Drown's Abandoned Trip

Over the teacups, when the engagement of Bernie Drown and Sam Boardman is the subject of discussion, it is usually remarked that it was significant that Sam didn't think of proposing until he heard that Miss Drown was contemplating a trip to Europe. The report was given out that she was going abroad with her parents, and a little later came the news that as her father's business demanded his presence here they could not go. And the next thing was the announcement of the engagement. All of which has furnished the gossips a tidbit to give zest to their tea-cup chatter.

Leake's Abdication

Reports to the contrary notwithstanding, the relations between John D. Spreckels and Sam Leake have not been strained, and when the latter leaves the Call on the first of October he will be as friendly as ever with the proprietor of the paper. It has been reported that he intended to join forces with Thomas H. Williams on the turf, but he has no such intention. He will go East in a short time, and he expects to remain away indefinitely. Though Leake was not a trained newspaper man when he took charge of the Call, he developed a wonderful knack for scooping his contemporaries. During his management of the paper he secured some of the biggest scoops that ever agitated local newspaper circles. He scored over his contemporaries last week when he secured, exclusively, the confession of Jack Gamble, the deputy United States marshal, who had been engaged in defrauding the Government. Leake will be succeeded in the managing editorship of the Call by John McNaught, who has been the chief editorial writer of the paper for several years. McNaught is an experienced and cultured journalist, and like Mr. Dent Robert, managing editor of the Examiner, he has no ax to grind, and he will therefore devote himself exclusively to the business of directing subordinates in the work of gathering all the news that's deemed fit to print.

Hearst's Tardy Call

Mr. William R. Hearst did not make his appearance in the Examiner office until last Friday night, four days after his arrival. He spent the intervening days with his wife at his mother's home near Pleasanton. He found everything running smoothly in the office of the big daily, and after a brief consultation with his managing editor took his departure. He had his big French automobile shipped from the East, and he intends to make several long trips in it with his wife, who is a great auto enthusiast. Several Democratic politicians expected to have an interview with Hearst during his visit, but the expectation was not mutual. The Presidential bee has not deserted his bonnet, but he is not taking the local politicians as seriously as he did a few months ago. It has probably occurred to him that a Californian delegation has a very feeble voice in a National Convention.

A Refreshing Contrast

A short time ago the news came from France that Mrs. Will Crocker was over there giving her children an education, and now I hear that Princess Colonna, who formerly lived on the Comstock while the money was being made that enabled her to buy a worthless Italian nobleman, is in Paris giving her daughter's education a Parisian finish. In refreshing contrast to these news items about Californian women who are representative of America's new-rich, is the statement of the Marquise de Mores who was formerly a Miss Hoffman of New York, to the effect that she has returned to this country from France to put her boy in an American college. She wants her boy to receive, she says, an American education and to become an American citizen and business man.

Because She Rubbered

The moral of this story is that it's a foolish woman who opens her husband's letters. An ex-Attorney-General of this State has for a client a rich New Yorker, who is here incognito, and who came hither to escape indictment under the anti-trust law for having interested himself in the corner in cotton. He has a sweetheart in New York, and as a precautionary measure she was instructed to address her letters to the attorney direct, and he was shown a sample of her handwriting so that her correspondence would not be opened by mistake. Several days ago the attorney's wife visited his office during his absence, and saw a letter on his desk addressed in the chirography of the sex. Though her husband is not a lothario, and though he is almost old enough to be beyond suspicion, she viewed that letter with alarm. The handwriting was of a dashing character and it seemed to bespeak a flirtatious nature. She resolved to open it and she did so. The first words were, "Dear Billy." She almost fainted. She had never called her husband anything but William. This evidence of familiarity was too much, but she read on, and before she was half way through she was blushing like a rose. When William appeared on the scene she was finishing the inevitable postscript, and preparing to tear her hair. William had a very bad quarter of an hour with his wife, and he had to call in the original "Dear Billy" to straighten out the tangle.

That Carmen Romance

Their voices having departed Signor Domenico Russo and Estefania Collamarini are now having their love affairs exploited by the dailies for advertising purposes. It is a very pathetic story the dailies tell of Russo's devotion to his Carmen of real life, and her cruel desertion of her Don Jose. She is said to have robbed him and levanted with some rich Italian, and Russo is said to have come to America in the steerage in search of his fickle ladilove, intent upon tragic revenge. It is wonderful how easily the dailies are gulled, and how ready they are to exploit the free-love habits of the pigstye for sensational purposes. The tale is a bald and unconvincing one, and lacking in verisimilitude. Russo was deserted, he says, in Italy, and yet he came all the way to America in search of Collamarini, though he had no reason to think that she had left her native country. She ran away with a wealthy Italian, and yet she robbed the tenor before going. Russo is now at Pastori's in San Rafael serving as an attraction for the resort made famous by the Von Schroeder libel suit. The probability is that Collamarini is in the same neighborhood, and that before long both will be advertised to appear in "Carmen" again. When Collamarini first came to this city she was with an Italian opera company that had toured Mexico and that was stranded here after playing a brief engagement at the California. At the same time Russo was singing at the Tivoli with a woman who was known as his wife. The story was then told that he had lived with Collamarini in Mexico, and that she had deserted him there, having shifted her affections to another and richer man. It was also related that she had robbed Russo of a large sum of money and it was pointed out that she was a Carmen in real life. But presently they came together, the nominal wife disappeared, and Collamarini was forgiven. Either Russo's personal history has repeated itself or else the press agent has scored again.

Henry and Margaret to Part

Before leaving town Mr. Louis Nethersole, the press agent of the Miller-Anglin company, sent me a note to the effect that this is the last season in which Mr. Henry Miller and Margaret Anglin will appear together as joint stars. "So," says Mr. Nethersole, "after the present week, San Francisco will see them in the same bill no more. Miss Margaret Anglin, at the close of the present tour in Chicago, in November, is to sail for England, there to remain for a long period, while Mr. Miller will return to New York to produce his annual play. This is the fifth season in which the playgoers of San Francisco have been delighted with and enjoyed the interesting art and effort of these two earnest players, and it seems a pity their interests should compel the putting an end permanently to this interesting combination."

That Report of Marriage

Is it possible that a rupture has occurred of the very cordial relationship that has existed so long between Mr. Miller and Miss Anglin? When they were here a year ago I reported that that relationship had ripened into a very tender passion, and that plans had been made for their marriage, but those plans never reached fruition. The circumstance of Mr. Miller's being bound by the ties of matrimony, from which it is not easy to obtain release, may have been responsible for Margaret's remaining a bachelor maid, but the fact is that she entertained a highly sentimental regard for her twin-star. And now Mr. Nethersole reports that they are to part professionally forever. But press agents are as careless of their facts as Sunday supp. writers. However, Mr. Miller and Miss Anglin have never been associated as twin-stars except in San Francisco and on a brief tour eastward, during the interim of the regular seasons in New York. And both, by the way, are much more highly appreciated in San Francisco than they are in the big metropolis. Margaret Anglin has never made any distinct success in New York. She is leading lady of the Empire stock, but she has never been starred. Miller is of course recognized as a fine actor, but New Yorkers think he has long since ceased to be an ideal young lover. They regard him as an anachronism in anything under forty. But here in San Francisco, where our theatrical milk nowadays is of the skimmed variety, we feel very grateful to Miss Anglin and Mr. Miller for many artistic treats, and we rave over them theatrically and socially as though they were the great luminaries of the histrionic world. Here they are starred, and they love the flattering unction of our adulation, provincial though it is. Hence I am incredulous at the report that they are never again to shed the luminous beams of their united effulgence on us again.

Margaret's Social Engagements

Margaret Anglin did not do half the things socially that the papers said she did. It was a case of one society editor originating and the rest slavishly copying as usual. At one big luncheon given to her at the University Club the popular actress merely came in with the coffee and would not have done that had not the hostess with tears explained to her that she had invited all her guests with the understanding that the luncheon was in Miss Anglin's honor and that she was coming. The tea given by the Misses Joliffe about which the dailies said so much was given to quite different people. The Joliffes only entertained Miss Anglin once and that was at a little supper after the theatre to which absolutely no one was invited except Mr. and Mrs. Neely O'Sullivan, whom Miss Anglin was desirous of meeting. The only large thing which Miss Anglin accepted was the supper given by William Greer Harrison, who is a friend of Mr. Miller. Miss Anglin was very busy this year and she lived very quietly, when she had time to live at all, at St. Dunstan's with her cousin. Mr. Miller had an apartment in the Fair flats, with some of the other men in the company. He gave a large dinner there last Sunday night, his guests being a mixture of society and the stage and including Miss Anglin, the Joliffes, Mr. Harrison and Mr. Phelan. The entire Miller company, by the way, went to see Florence Roberts in "La Gioconda," and they have been raving wildly over the performance ever since.

Among the arrivals at Byron Hot Springs last week were Dr. T. H. Morris, Mr. and Mrs. M. H. Havens, Mr. and Mrs. Charles W. Meyer of San Francisco, Mr. and Mrs. J. H. Macdonald of Oakland, Herman C. Meyer of Stockton, and L. E. Larson of Sacramento.

Not to be Trifled With

Miss Jean Dwyer, the aggressive school teacher who was summoned before the Board of Education the other day on a charge of insubordination, is the same tabasco-tempered woman who made a sensational exit from the California hotel some months ago. Miss Dwyer is a woman with a lively sense of the rights of her sex, and at the same time she is a stickler for the courtesies due. She had trouble at the California because she didn't like the service. She spanked one bell-boy, ducked another one's head in a bath-tub and threw a glass full of toothpicks at a waiter whom she considered a trifle fresh. The management remonstrated and when Miss Dwyer left the house she rode away in an express wagon seated on her trunk.

"She's the finest girl I know."

"What's fine about her?"

"Well, she never gossips, or flirts, and she doesn't care about dress."

"She must be awfully uninteresting."

The Crush on Lurline

Once more I am informed of the rivalry of French noblemen in pursuit of the hand and fortune of Lurline Spreckels. She is regarded as a great catch in Paris for the fame of the great sugar magnate has spread to that country, and Miss Lurline is believed to be an heir to the big Spreckels fortune. But Mrs. Spreckels is very ambitious and she doesn't want her daughter to marry a man who is not of the highest rank. One of the suitors is only a baron, and he has the tenacity of a summer cold. The Count of Montebello is another suitor and though he is of higher rank, French counts are scarcely worth hall room. One of the objections to French noblemen is that their prejudice against Americans is so great that sometimes they cut even their mothers-in-law.

Not Too Exclusive for Him

The unblushing frankness of Madame La Bavarde is amazing. In a recent issue of the Bulletin she told of the coming of Lord Lonsdale, and stated that he was a man of "numberless peculiarities" which were responsible for the fact "that the curate of a wealthy and well known parish was dismissed by his rector for having been seen in the Earl's company"; and she added, "San Francisco would indeed be under a lucky star should it so happen that this titled couple" (Lonsdale and wife) "should chance to be here at the same time with the Astors. Think of the social possibilities opened up by such a conjunction. Our head would be up in the air for many a day to come." How is that for a confession of snobbery? Here is a man whose "peculiarities," in the opinion of a clergyman, rendered him unfit to associate with decent men, and yet Madame La Bavarde goes into hysterics over the prospect of social contact with him. Perhaps she contemplates inviting him to a Friday Fortnightly to mingle with the buds of our provincial swim.

The Pedar Bruguieres

The Pedar Bruguieres have a baby and they are very happy. Pedar's second wife, it will be remembered, was a Miss Andrews, and it was said at the time that Mrs. Bruguiere mere disapproved of the match. Though of distingue appearance the bride was not of the local haut ton. However the match has proved most felicitous.

Cupid's Plans May Be Upset

On the heels of the report of the postponement of the marriage of Vesta Shortridge and Emil Bruguiere comes the rumor that the engagement has been broken off. The Bruguieres are such eccentric chaps that nobody will be surprised to hear that Emil has decided to remain a bachelor awhile longer. Though of course it is by no means improbable that he was given his conge, for Miss Shortridge is a very independent as well as a talented girl. Before Bruguiere fell in love with her she was thinking of becoming an actress, and her friends were sure that she would be a success on the stage. She nursed an ambition for literary fame, too, and wrote some things worth reading. Mr. Bruguiere is going abroad with his mother, I hear, and he expects to spend some time in Newport on his return. The social conquests of his brother have fired him with an ambition to mingle with the fashionable herd.

She Is Going Abroad

Miss Clara Alexander, the clever little Southerner whose darky dialect recitals have been all the go in society drawing-rooms for the past year, will shortly storm the London public. As everything American is popular in England just now, Miss Alexander's entertainment will likely prove a gold mine for her. She also intends going to Paris, Berlin and Vienna. She has just returned from the South, where she was the pet of society. At Montecito she was entertained by the Alexander Thaws and others of the plutocracy. She will be in San Francisco only for a few weeks before leaving for the East and several of the women's clubs are interesting themselves in getting up a farewell recital as a testimonial. She will visit Memphis, which was her home before she came to California, and will give a recital there before going to New York. Mrs. Voorhies, Mrs. de Young, Mrs. Huntington and others of San Francisco's smart set are interested in making the final weeks of Miss Alexander's stay here pleasant. Mrs. Voorhies will chaperon her at the big charity ball next month.

She Is Not to be Rushed

The dailies report that Miss Constance De Young is to be one of the debutantes this season. The dailies are wrong. Mrs. De Young has no intention of rushing this young girl into the social whirl. She is not yet eighteen and her education is not yet complete. She will spend some time yet at the convent in San Rafael, and then she will be taken abroad and presented at court in England, after which she will be ripe for her debut. Mrs. De Young has become one of the most popular hostesses in society, and it is said that she owes her popularity to the fact that she takes an interest in all the details of conversation. I have noticed that she affects the European habit of wearing a thumb ring. She is a connoisseur in jewels, by the way, and she is the proud possessor of one of the largest rubies in this city.

Brown—She's too conventional to suit me.

Jones—Is that so?

Brown—Yes; if you take her out and make love to her she immediately thinks of marriage.

A Big Lion Coming

Richard Le Gallienne is said to be contemplating a visit to this coast. What vast opportunities would be afforded the tuft-hunters of society if this distinguished literary genius appeared in their midst! If a mere charlatan and faker of the Fra Elbertus brand could rouse them to beatific ecstasy, what wouldn't happen if such a man as Le Gallienne exposed his mane to their caresses. But I am of the opinion that when he comes that clever and intellectual young woman, Emily Rosenstirn, will monopolize his attentions, for I hear that she kept up a correspondence with the author of "Prose Fancies" for a long time, and her friends say that some of his best work is to be found in those very same letters. Le Gallienne is now almost as well known in this country as he is in England, where he was born, principally on account of his cisisbeistic novelettes and his essays, in which he expounds the theories of that peculiar cult of beauty and hedonism known as estheticism. But Le Gallienne, unlike that most brilliant of all esthetics who figured in the most mephitic scandal of his time, never set out to justify his theories by his personal example. The world first took notice of him when he published his "Religion of a Literary Man." The book and author were made famous by the denunciation of the English clergy. That was in 1893, and since then he has added immensely to the delight of English readers. He is a married man, but he has agreed with his wife to live apart two months in every year, during which time each does as fancy dictates, and at its expiration no questions are asked. The plan is said to work admirably.

Our Busy Booksmiths

The work of Californian authors is still in demand in the East, and our booksmiths are kept busy at their typewriters. Geraldine Bonner expects to have her second novel on the market in a few days. It is to be called "Tomorrow's Tangle." It deals with the period at the close of the Bonanza days when dwellers in foothill cabins and mining camps were transported to Nob Hill and the highest crest of the wave of prosperity. It is a theme and a time that Miss Bonner has shown herself capable of handling. Mrs. Fremont Older is at work on a novel dealing with the poet Byron and his liaison with the Countess de Gamba. She collected some valuable material during her recent visit to Italy. Jack London's next book, dealing with the dwellers in the London slum district, is to appear soon. Mr. London is today the most actively alive observer who records his impressions in print. Incidentally it may be remarked that he is one of the most industrious writers of the day. About this time last year he had three books published in rapid succession. And now "The Call of the Wild" is without exception the most talked-of book of the day. There is scarcely a month that passes without his contributing a story to some magazine, and his essays are a feature of the literary periodicals.

Mrs. London and the Letters

The papers seem to be unduly interested in the private affairs of the Jack Londons these days. The question of whether they have or have not made up their differences is an endless topic of discussion. I am told by a friend of both that Mrs. London and Jack are on the friendliest terms, though they no longer live in the same house. The latter calls every day at the home of his mother-in-law, where his wife and children are living, and enjoys a cup of tea and a chat with the mother of his children. A little while ago word came to me from the East that it was "The Kempton Wace Letters" that aroused Mrs. London's momentary ire against her husband. The bald way in which marriage is treated in the Letters might naturally shock many a wife. "The Kempton Wace Letters" are several leagues in advance of "Gallia," "The Heavenly Twins" and "The Yellow Aster" in their open treatment of topics usually left to physicians and heredity faddists. For a time it was supposed that London wrote the letters treating marriage from the scientific standpoint and Miss Strunsky those discussing the passionate side, but it has lately been stated that the reverse was the case. I don't think any one should miss reading the Letters, but it might be well to keep them away from little sister until she is a year or so older.

Miss Bonner Going Abroad

Miss Geraldine Bonner will soon leave for New York, and later on she will go abroad with her sister, Mrs. Albert Boardman, who has recently married her children off in a most satisfactory manner. It is not generally known that the Bonners are related by marriage to the Vanderbilts, the Cabot Lodges and Bayards, or that Miss Bonner's aunt is Lady Russell of London.

Mrs. Carter Pomeroy and her daughter, Miss Christine, who is to be one of this winter's debutantes, have been rusticating during a great deal of the summer season at a farm near Guerneville. This was varied by trips to country homes in San Mateo county.

That Amusing Editorial

The Examiner's editorial across the page last Thursday excited considerable interest in political circles. As a means of titillating the cynics, and augmenting the gayety of the campaign, it was a huge success. It was evident that the writer had a hard time trying to make himself clear while seeking to gladhand everybody from the Labor Party to the minority in the Democratic convention. The supposition is that it was written to placate Mr. Lane, who has not quite recovered from his indignation of the last campaign. Mr. Hearst desires it to be understood that he wants harmony in the party, and also that he would like to establish the entente cordiale between the Democracy and Union Labor.

A Wag's Suggestion

In the gubernatorial campaign Mr. Franklin K. Lane assured every audience that he addressed that he was eager to be Governor so that his little son who was growing up would be able, in later years, to point with pride to his father's record. He gave many people the impression that he was running for Governor merely to please papa's boy When Lane's foolish letter was read in the Democratic convention Tuesday night, a wag remarked, "Last year Lane's boy was urging him to 'Get there.' He should now advise him to 'Get next.'"

When Choate Made a Hit

Franklin Lane is telling a very good story which came out at the luncheon table on the occasion of his lunching with the President. Governor Francis of Missouri was present and the Governor was thanking the President for the letters which the Chief Executive gave him for his Continental trip, and which naturally made the Governor's stay abroad a very agreeable one.

"And how did Choate treat you?" inquired the President.

Francis replied that he was very agreeable. "I told him," he said, "that he had made a great hit with the women of Missouri when, in response to a question as to what he would choose to be if he were reincarnated, he said he would prefer to be Mrs. Choate's second husband. I told him they thought it a very graceful compliment to his wife. He laughed and said he was glad the story made a hit in Missouri, for it fell rather flat in England. Of course I wanted to know why and he said that shortly after the mot became public he met the Duchess of Devonshire, who is considered one of the cleverest women in England, and she said, 'Oh, Mr. Choate, I've been wanting to ask you something ever since I heard that story. Who is Mrs. Choate's second husband?'"

Would Pass on His Own Bill

Dr. W. F. McNutt's failure to secure letters of administration on the estate of Miss Isabella Clark was, no doubt, a great shock to him. The doctor is one of the most enterprising medical men in town, and he is a wonderfully tactful and energetic hustler. He runs a big hospital but it does not engross all his attention. He devotes a good deal of his time to politics, and is an aspirant for high office. Miss Clark had been under his medical care for many years, and she had the most implicit confidence in him. There is no doubt that she intended that he should have the management of her estate, but her relatives stoutly objected to his handling the property. They believe that he is more skilled in medicine than in the administration of the property interests of a dead woman. But probably their chief objection was based upon the supposition that as administrator he would be empowered to approve his bill for medical services rendered the deceased. Naturally he has a high appreciation of the value of those services.

Sick Men Are Well Again

General Lucius Harwood Foote, who was thought to be at death's door a week or so ago, is well on the road to recovery. Dr. Behr, another member of the Sunday Breakfast Club who was thought to have eaten his last dejeuner inBohemia a few weeks since, is about again and looks stronger than before his hospital experience. Ned Hamilton of the Examiner, whose late illness caused his friends considerable anxiety, has quite recovered.

Beginning at the Lowest Round

Dr. Robert McLean's eldest son has entered the training school on Goat Island with view to a naval career. He wishes to perfect himself in the fine points of a seaman's work before attempting the higher branches. This democratic spirit is more to be commended in young McLean since his father is worth half a million.

Mrs. Tomas Magee Sr. has decided to take possession of her home in Broadway this winter. She will have as a companion her cousin, Miss Ladd. Mrs. Magee leased her house for a year after the death of her husband and has been with her mother since that time.

A Studio Reception

A congenial little group of artists and musicians has established studios in the Roosevelt building in Sutter street. Sacramento, Clay and lower Montgomery streets, that used to be so favored by artists for home purposes, are not so popular as formerly. The elevator as opposed to countless flights of stairs was no doubt the chief incentive to the uptown hegira. Three of the Roosevelt colony gave their first studio at home on Wednesday, guests pouring in during the afternoon and evening. The hostesses were Miss Bell, who does wood carving and china painting, Mrs. Jessie Dean Moore, the soprano, and Miss Ena Langworthy, a very cultured young pianiste who lately came here from Boston. Some delightful music was given by Theodor Salmon, the pianist, a late-comer from the East; Mrs. Moore, who gave that favorite classic, "Nymphs and Fauns"; Miss Judd, who whistled a staccato polka and a valse song; Miss Longworthy, Miss Moore, Miss Countryman, Miss Johnson and Dr. J. A. Brown. The last named has a fine, big voice well suited to his numbers, David's "King of the Winds" and Osgood's "My Little Woman."

Though I have never seen mention of Mrs. Edgar D. Wakeman's at homes in the society columns of the dailies, she gives them occasionally. Though informal, they are very charming and one is always sure of hearing some good music there. The Wakemans live in Noe street, out on Castro Heights. Mr. Wakeman's father was the famous old sea captain and Keith Wakeman, the actress, is his sister.

Arthur Nahl, the son of the famous artist, who was married the other day, is one of the heirs to a very valuable collection of pictures owned by his father. In the collection are pictures by Rubens and several other of the old masters. Some of them used to hang in the old Academy of Sciences building and a number of them are stored here.

First Woman (at dinner party): Doesn't Mrs. Slim look handsome when she is dressed?

Second Woman: I'd hate to see her, then, when she is undressed.

Will She Marry Him?

Though the dailies have announced the engagement of Pearl Landers with young George Whittell, son of the capitalist, her family deny the fact. And until Miss Landers is really in front of the altar, with the plain gold band on the third finger of her slim left hand, her friends say there's no man can be sure he has won her. Ever since she came out in society she has been followed by a train of admirers. First it was young "Morty" Gibbons who married one of the Stubbs sisters not so very long ago. Pearl Landers was barely eighteen when she became engaged to Harry Scott. They were tremendously epris while the betrothal lasted, but it was off almost as soon as on. Mrs. Scott senior was said not wholly to approve of her youthful son's marrying, and Pearl's parents also thought their daughter o'er young to marry. She had a delightful "bud" winter and was invited out so frequently that she had to take the rest cure afterward. This summer she distinguished herself at Del Monte as a daring chauffeuse and a mutual love of motor vehicles brought young Whittell into Miss Landers's train of wooers. Their engagement has been expected to be announced for some weeks. Miss Landers is not a beauty, but she is chic and dresses well. Her sister Helen, who is Mrs. Fred Tallant, has all the pulchritude of the family. Mrs. Jack Johnston of Los Angeles, Bernice Landers that was, is their cousin. George Whittell is immensely wealthy, his mother being one of the Nicholas Luning heiresses.

Ayres-Searles

Dennis Searles is receiving very sincere congratulations on his recently announced engagement. His betrothed, Miss Caroline Ayres, is a very popular and clever girl, but it is only lately that she has gone out much in society. After her return from Europe she devoted herself to study, though for a time ill-health kept her ambition from having full play. Her elder sister, it will be remembered, when a student at the Hamilton Grammar School, won the prize offered by the Examiner of a trip to Europe. They are daughters of Grosvenor P. Ayres. Mr. Searles is cashier of the Pacific Coast Borax Company.

Robert Mein's Fiancee

It was some months ago that I announced the engagement of Miss Adelaide Deming and Robert Mein, which the dailies are again exploiting as news. At that time, no confirmation of the announcement could be gained from Mr. Mein who had a few months before emphatically denied his rumored engagement with another young woman. The Mein boys are regarded as great catches in Oakland's swim and both of them have been kept busy denying engagements into which they were reported as having entered. It is said that their mother is so devoted to them that she is reluctant to lose them. It seems definitely understood this time, however, that there is to be a wedding this winter. Miss Deming is the only unmarried daughter of the Edmund Orr Demings. She is a tall and dashing brunette with a stunning figure. Her twin sister Alice married Harry Corson Clarke, the comedian. Her cousin Florence, the richest heiress of all the Deming clan, is the wife of C. K. Harley.

Society Agitated

San Jose society is seriously agitated over the "knocking" which it received at the tongue of Mrs. Mary Chynoweth, mistress of the religious cult known as the "True Life Church." Mrs. Hayes-Chynoweth is a woman of great importance in San Jose, not only because of her great wealth but also for the reason that she is the mother of the Hayes brothers—Red and Black—who control the newspaper field, dominate politics, exercise a powerful influence in commercial circles and come pretty near running the town. It will be remembered that Mrs. Hayes-Chynoweth lambasted the San Jose Woman's Club before a large congregation in a San Jose church. That was bad enough, but to make matters worse the Mercury and Herald, both owned by the Hayes brothers, published the offensive discourse in full. The club includes in its membership the very cream of the elite of the Garden City, and they were severely condemned for giving an entertainment in aid of their building fund. Mrs. Hayes-Chynoweth pronounced it an iniquitous function, and likened its demoralizing influence unto those dens of iniquity where the demon Rum holds high carnival.

Did Spooks Help Her See It?

The fact is that the Pow-Wow, as it was called, was a very recherche affair for San Jose. As it was given under the auspices of a club which has always stood for the highest principles both in public and private life, it could not have been otherwise. It was what those graphic gushers of the dailies usually designate as "a brilliant social success." Everything was highly proper, and no liquors were dispensed, and yet the Pow-Wow was execrated as "an evil resort." To say that the ladies had reached a white heat of indignation would be putting it mildly. They say that no member of the family of the mistress of the "True Life Church" attended the Pow-Wow, and therefore Mrs. Hayes-Chynoweth couldn't have known what she was talking about. But they forget that she enjoys an intimate relationship with the spirit world, and that she may have been vouchsafed a view of the festivities in a trance.

A Pertinent Query

She discovered the iron mine, whence the wealth of her sons came, through spirit aid. Surely she could have invoked the same aid to take a peep at the Pow-Wow, though of course the spooks may have trifled with her. However she is the dictator of San Jose's social affairs these days, for she controls the press through her sons, who are all powerful. Indeed it may be said that San Joseans are looking through a haze at all political and business matters these days. The fear of disastrous business consequences deters people from antagonizing the two brothers, and many of the husbands and brothers of the members of the San Jose Woman's Club feel that discretion prompts allegiance to them. But the women themselves are inclined to kick over the traces. At a social function where the matter was being discussed the other day, one of them asked, "Shall we rise up and be independent women or shall we take the lashing and caress the hand that holds the whip?" No resolutions were adopted but the ladies agreed that they were getting tired of being under spook dominion.

Her Model Sons

The Hayes brothers dictate nearly all the political appointments in San Jose, and even the lady president of the Woman's Club, who is also a member of the board of library trustees, was not appointed to the position until the Hayes brothers gave their consent. At Mrs. Chynoweth's meetings her sons usually assist by giving little preliminary sermons, generally eulogistic of their mother. Then she always holds up "my sons" as exemplars of righteousness. In the sermon in which she grilled the Pow-Wow she said that she had had great experience with the men and women "who are following after the vices of the world" and that she has found that if they had been kept at home and taught to "keep themselves clean," they would be "just as good as my sons here." The followers of Mrs. Chynoweth regard her as a sort of senior partner of the deity.

The Wrights' Suits Ended

The family row of the Wrights has just been ended, by the dismissal of the two score or more suits in which the W. H. Wrights and Frank V. Wright have figured for two years past. The suits were to determine rights in several companies in which the plaintiffs and defendants were interested. The Wrights, it will be recalled, were brought into the limelight of notoriety over four years ago by the failure of the Union bank of San Jose. Ward Wright was the president of the collapsed bank. He was the first of his family to leave the old home at Wright's Station and launch himself into San Jose's financial world. He married a daughter of Barney Murphy, and that gave him social as well as financial recognition. Then he secured his brother Frank a position as secretary of the San Jose Building and Loan Association. Before that Frank had worked around an unpretentious hostelry at Wright's, and nobody thought his business acumen was excessive. However, he forged ahead in the financial world and clinched his triumph by wedding Miss Susie Davis, daughter of a millionaire who was formerly partner of James G. Fair. Will Wright later on came to San Jose from Los Angeles, and while abroad in the interests of the San Jose Fruit Packing Association secured a patent for sealing cans out of which he made big money. He did not marry so well from the financial viewpoint as did his brothers. His was a pure love match, his wife being a bookkeeper. However, it later turned out that she had some money, too, for she lent the Union bank sixty thousand dollars, taking a mortgage on the bank building as security. This fact came out when the institution suffered its collapse, and occasioned much surprise. The creditors were incredulous.

Sequestered New Yorkers

C. H. Geldert and Beverly B. Tilden, two wealthy New York bachelors who have been keeping bachelors' hall in their handsome Santa Clara county home above Alum Rock Park, have moved into San Jose. These two gentlemen arrived in San Jose nearly two years ago while on a trip around the world. They were so favorably impressed with the "vale of prunes" that they canceled the remainder of their itinerary and purchased a ranch overlooking beautiful Alum Rock Park, and set to work improving it in an extravagant manner. Tired of the life in the American metropolis, they decided to remain permanently in the West, and since then they have practically buried themselves from the world, only going into town as necessity compelled. As a diversion they stocked their ranch with pigs and chickens. But the quiet life has proved too slow for them and they have forsaken the ranch and have moved into town for the winter. Geldert was once a prominent New York actor, and Tilden is a nephew of Samuel Tilden.

A House With a History

F. B. Myers, a wealthy Oakland capitalist, has purchased one of the most handsome properties on the famous Alameda in San Jose. It is the palatial Wilcox property, which, since its erection nearly eight years ago, has never had an occupant. Charles Wilcox, a wealthy Santa Clara county attorney and a member of one of the oldest and most influential families in the Garden City, started the construction of the building, and after spending twenty-eight thousand dollars he suffered financial reverses and in a fit of despondency put an end to his life. The property reverted to the Commercial and Savings Bank which completed the building. Years have passed and the magnificent structure has remained without an occupant, no one seemingly desirous of purchasing such a palatial residence. As people have passed it they have looked upon it with astonishment, and all manner of stories regarding the structure have been circulated. F. B. Myers came to San Jose several weeks ago and taking a liking to the property purchased it. He is fitting the place up magnificently and within a short time he will occupy it with his family.

It Was a Dull Season

It was a club cynic who remarked the other day that the Hotel Rafael must be nearly deserted since it has to depend on one of its waitresses for a scandal. It wasn't a very gay season at the hotel, though a few society people and a host of climbers spent the season there. Teas, luncheons and cards were the means by which people sought to vary the monotony, but even these diversions proved monotonous before the season was half over. Grim visaged Ennui held court on the veranda, and frowned Folly into the background. Mrs. H. P. Sonntag and Mrs. Toy were the most active of the hostesses, and they no doubt feel that they had quite a successful social season. Mrs. Sonntag has social ambition and she is an interesting woman. She gowns herself well and makes friends with infinite discretion. This winter she is going to New York with her daughter, to finish her off in Miss Ely's fashionable seminary. Girls who have served time at Miss Ely's are supposed to achieve the brand of the elite. Mrs. Sonntag is one of the three Bovee sisters. One of them became Mrs. Toy and another became the stepmother of Frank Norris.

The Real Swells are Home

The Upper Thirteen of San Rafael have returned from the "springs" and the "coast," those indefinite havens of the impecunious, and the matrons are now conning their inventories to ascertain whether their crockery and their linen are intact after having been used by the summer tenants. The winter campaign will open in November, when the San Rafael Improvement Club, of which Mrs. Willie Babcock is president, will give a flower show, the proceeds of which are to be used for the extermination of mosquitos. There is to be a vaudeville entertainment during the afternoon and evening, and then the ladies who were disappointed at not being invited to assist Mrs. George H. Powers last spring will be given an opportunity to show how really clever they are.

His Speech Enthused Them

Signor Ventura, the founder of the Polyglot Club, is quite a humorist. At the Bixler dinner he was called upon to give a toast in Italian, and he responded with the utmost gravity, whereupon the other guests sat up and assumed an air of deep interest. The speaker's impassioned delivery and wild gesticulation stirred his hearers up to frequent outbursts of applause. When it was all over he explained that he had been counting in Italian.

Her Italian Was Good

At the Polyglot Club's entertainment last Friday evening, Grace Llewelyn Jones, who is to play Phedre at Berkeley, showed what she could do in the histrionic line. She appeared in an episode from the "Inferno" and she gave evidence of considerable dramatic force. Her delivery was rather monotonous but her Italian was of the purest, and it evoked the enthusiasm of the swarthy representatives of the Latin race. Miss Jones was picturesquely attired in a long white robe completely covered with Venetian lace, and her head was crowned with bands of pearls, while on her corsage were placed enormous silver ornaments, said to have a remarkable history. The Polyglot is the most decided culture club we have ever had here. Many of those present were Channing Auxiliary members, before whom the Professor gave readings and lectures when he first came to San Francisco.

"Are you ever conscience stricken when you lie to your wife?"

An Alamedan in Russia

Mrs. Carl Eichwaldt, who was Florence Delanoy of Alameda, is visiting her husband's relatives in Reval, Russia. She writes very interesting letters home about her experiences in the Empire. In a recent one she told of a smart dinner she attended where on the menu were salt fish soup, wax beans prepared with cheese, white sweet bread with almonds, sour cream, and plum pudding with raspberry syrup. One of the guests who could speak a little English and who prided himself on his knowledge of American politics said to the Alamedan: "What a pity it is that the ruler of the United States is not a gentleman. It's too bad that he goes about with patches on his trousers." He had evidently derived his information from cartoons. A feminine guest asked Mrs. Eichwaldt if one could observe the eruption of Mount Pelee from San Francisco.

Still a Fashion Arbitre

If you have noticed any men wearing bright red ties around town this week, you need not fancy them color-blind. It's the new London fashion—"the King Edward tie." Haberdashers in Vienna and London are turning out rush orders for red ties, which King Edward introduced when at Marienbad, where he went to reduce his flesh. He lost ten pounds weight at the baths. England's King still goes in for smart dressing. In a recent hunting trip in Austria he wore a bright green suit with an Alpine hat of the same shade.

The Prince to Become a Banker

Although it is reported that Prince Poniatowski intends returning to this city again, I have heard from pretty reliable authority that he is to embark in a banking business in Paris which is to have a branch in New York. I have also been informed that it is to be backed by a wealthy Jewish family. It is not generally known that Poniatowski is of Jewish extraction. He had for a grandmother a wealthy Jewess named Heine.

Mrs. Hayward Called a Halt

The domestic and financial affairs of Alvinza Hayward are exciting a great deal of interest these days. When it was reported that Mr. Hayward had been requested by his wife to vacate the family home in San Mateo it was surmised that the old man was losing his grip, and that he had been unable to recover from financial reverses, but while people are worrying about him he is not in the least disturbed over his prospects. Though he is eighty-four years of age the speculative spirit is still strong within him, and he is as courageous as ever when it comes to risking his money in big enterprises. It was, by the way, his inclination to give free rein to this speculative spirit that led to his most recent settlement with his wife. He had met with disaster in several enterprises, and his money began to disappear so rapidly that Mrs. Hayward feared that they would soon be left penniless. She thought that the spiritualists who were guiding her husband were giving him the wrong tip too often, and she decided to call a halt.

He's Far From Broke

An attorney was consulted, and negotiations for a settlement were opened with the result that an arbitrator was appointed, and Mrs. Hayward secured about a million dollars' worth of property. One of the recent unfortunate investments of Mr. Hayward was made at the instigation of General C. P. Egan, of embalmed beef notoriety. On Egan's recommendation he invested a quarter of a million dollars in a mine in Mexico and lost the money. Hayward's friendship for Egan dates back about ten years. Some people in Arizona salted a mine on Hayward, and got away with nearly two million dollars. Egan was then in the army, and he went to Arizona and recovered about half the money. Hayward afterwards gave Egan a piece of property in Montgomery street, adjoining the present site of the Hayward building and valued at sixty thousand dollars. Since making his settlement with his wife Hayward has developed a quicksilver mine in the Livermore valley out of which he is said to be making another fortune. So he is far from broke.

Marriage with Foreigners

A correspondent who uses a crest on her stationery writes to take exception to my remarks anent the engagement of May Goelet and John Henry Innes Ker, eighth Duke of Roxburghe. She contends that foreign marriages are as a rule more desirable than those contracted in this country, for the reason that an Englishman, or even a Continental noble, has a career before him. He is interested in Parliament, in politics in the army or his estates. His wife has besides her social duties, numerous others to perform and the twain are constantly kept busy with some definite object in life before them. On the other hand the average man to whom the daughter of a millionaire would be married in this country would be of the so-called leisure class. His entire ambition would be to spend money and kill time. My correspondent evidently refers to the Eastern millionaire, whose program includes New York in the winter, with the entire morning and afternoon spent at the club; Palm Beach in the early spring, Europe later and then Newport. The millionaire class in this part of the country is so new that it has not learned how to have a leisure time.

The Duke and His Fiancee

This same correspondent tells me that the Duke of Roxburghe is a very fine young man, intent upon doing things. He has a seat in the House of Lords, a commission in the Guards, and is the head of one of the most distinguished and ancient of the Scottish lowlands' clans. He has one of the most superb seats in Scotland, "Floors Castle," and several other great estates, has seen service in South Africa, where he won distinction for gallantry on the field of battle, is a keen all-round sportsman and a splendid specimen of English aristocracy. He is an Eton and Sandhurst man and is a personal friend of the Prince of Wales. Miss Goelet is, perhaps, the richest heiress in America and belongs to an old and distinguished family. The American branch was founded by Francis Goelet of the French Huguenot family. He settled in America in 1676 and his descendants engaged in business in New York and wisely invested their savings in Manhattan real estate. Miss Goelet's grandfather, Robert Goelet, married Sarah Ogden, daughter of John Ogden, and their children were two sons, Robert and Ogden Goelet. Her father, Ogden Goelet, was an enthusiastic yachtsman. He built the Mayflower on which, in the nineties, he entertained the Prince of Wales, now King Edward, at Nice. He afterwards became prominent in English society.

An Iconoclastic Bride

As the taste for bric-a-brac has not altogether evaporated, people still select gimcracks for wedding presents, much to the disgust of brides. A recent bride received two statuettes that she considered hideous. But as they were gifts of friends of the groom she could not scorn them. One day, quite by accident of course, she dropped them while rearranging the ornaments in a room. She reported the accident to her husband with a good show of lamentation, and he promptly went down town and bought another pair exactly like the ones that had been broken.

In the Interest of the Nauy

The growth of popular interest in the Navy is evidenced by the rapid strides being made by the Navy League of the United States, an organization founded in New York less than a year ago, and including in its membership some of the most prominent, as well as the most wealthy and influential people in the land. A San Francisco section has recently been formed, and I am told that it is forging ahead with considerable rapidity. The Navy League is a purely patriotic organization, formed for the purpose of encouraging a study of the country's naval needs, and likewise of improving the members' knowledge of naval affairs generally. Its ultimate purpose is to influence legislation so as to provide the nation with a navy suitable for its needs, along rational lines, instead of in the hap-hazard manner which has characterized our construction hitherto. Few people know the difference between the battleship and the cruiser, between the smooth-bore and the semi-automatic gun. Just what differentiates Admiral Dewey's flagship Olympia from the good ship Prickly Heat, Captain Scratch, is a problem that baffles many, and confusion in the development of the navy is the result. The purpose of the Navy League is to enlighten the public and stimulate an interest in the navy as the similar leagues in England, Germany, Italy and France have done. The new San Francisco section is headed by Edward Mills Adams. Its secretary is George C. Sargent, son of former United States Senator Sargent, who was chairman of the Senate Naval Committee during his term of service in Washington. Some of the best known local business and professional men are joining it.

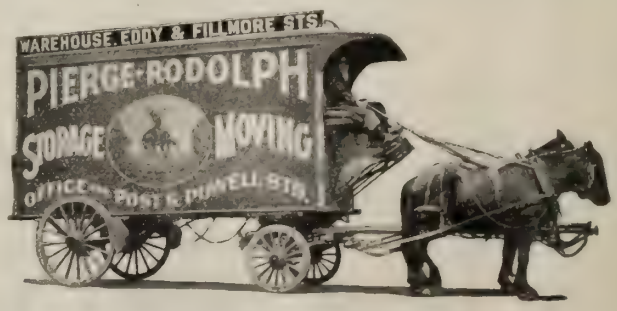
Captains to go Up

The retirement next month of Rear-Admiral Lewis Kempff, U. S. N., will give a decided upward jump to officers in the captains' grade. Captain Whiting is the next on the normal list for advancement; that is, he is the next one in the order of regular promotion, not having been advanced for war service. Ahead of him, however, are three of the "italicized" captains—Benjamin P. Lamberton, French E. Chadwick and Bowman H. McCalla, all of whom have been advanced for meritorious services in war, and, according to the provision that men thus advanced shall not interfere with the promotion of those over whose heads they are placed, all will go up together. Lamberton has just been appointed commander-in-chief of the South Atlantic station, which he will reach with the rank of Rear-Admiral. Chadwick was the captain of Sampson's flagship, the New York, during the Spanish war. As for McCalla and Whiting, they are both so well known on this coast that they may well-nigh be considered as Californians. Both have seen long service at the Mare Island Navy Yard, where McCalla is now the commandant. Captain Whiting's marriage with one of the handsome, clever Afong girls in Honolulu a few years ago was a great event in naval social circles.

A Gallant Officer

Hugh Rodman, Lieutenant-Commander U. S. Navy, looking stout and hearty, was one of the passengers for Honolulu on the Sonoma when she sailed for the islands the other day. Rodman is one of the philosophers of the service. He is also one of the many instances of men who stood low in their classes at Annapolis, and who in after years, in actual service, developed into the most efficient officers. He has been on duty long and often in the Hawaiian islands, and I venture to say that few officers in the Navy have done their work there as thoroughly and as well, as conscientious, energetic Hugh Rodman. It was he who, in his tiny vessel, the Iroquois, established the naval station at lonely Midway a few months ago.

Famous Naval Families



The Truxtun family seems destined to be "the" naval family, par excellence, of the country, four consecutive generations of the family having been represented in the Navy. The fourth of the name has just entered the Naval Academy as a midshipman, a lineal descendant of the original Commodore Truxtun of the French war of the eighteenth century, the Algerian war and the war of 1812. His son was another Commodore Truxtun, who entered the service in the middle of the last century, and the latter's son, Lieutenant-Commander "Billy" Truxtun, is the representative of the third generation. He is a cousin of Truxtun Beale. These old naval families still keep up their traditions. The service still has its Nicholson, in "Reggie" Nicholson; its Porter, in "Sod" Porter; its Bainbridge, in the Bainbridge-Hoffs, and others, all the direct descendants of the famous men who inaugurated the glories of the American Navy a century and more ago.

The Naval "Bug-House"

The Naval Hospital at the Mare Island yard has been dubbed "The Executive Officers' Bug-House." The nickname has been earned by the epidemic of broken down executive officers of Pacific coast vessels that have sought refuge from their ailments in the institution. No less than three out of the few executives on the station are now within its walls recuperating. Lieutenant-Commander Charles R. Laird of the Boston was the first to go. He was closely followed by John Blish, of the Alert, and T. D. Griffin of the Wyoming. An executive officer's billet is by no means an easy one these days. He is responsible for the organization and discipline and drill of the crew, the preservation of the hull, the general cleanliness of the ship and a multitude of other housekeeping duties, which, if properly performed, as they certainly have been by the officers named, are enough to try the strongest nervous temperaments. Lieutenant W. G. Miller is now executive of the Boston and "Bill" Bush is the new executive of the Wyoming. Their brother officers and friends are now speculating as to the time when they shall hie themselves to "The Bug-House."

Has a Younger Sister

The father of May Harrington, whose engagement with Lieutenant-Comander Niblack of the Navy was announced this week, is president of the Colusa County bank which was one of the heavy losers by the Eppinger failure. But the Harringtons have plenty of money and will soon move into their new home, where they expect to entertain a good deal this winter. Miss Harrington's younger sister will probably be among the season's debutantes.

Service Gossip

There is another bride coming to the Presidio. Miss Alice Maude Egan was married to Lieutenant Robert Grubbs, assistant surgeon, in Washington last week, and they are now en route by the Canadian Pacific to San Francisco.

The department offices at army headquarters have had numerous changes during the past year, nearly all of them, from the Commanding General down, having had new chiefs. The new chief quartermaster, Colonel W. S. Patten, arrived this week and assumed charge of that office, which since the departure of Lieutenant-Colonel John McE. Hyde has been under the charge of Major Devol. At the Presidio, too, the changes in command of the post have been very numerous of late. Colonel Charles H. Noble of the Tenth Infantry, who arrived from the Philippines a few days ago, is the ranking officer at present, and is consequently in command. Major B. H. Randolph, Artillery Corps, has returned from quite a long absence in the East. He was present at the recent army and navy manoeuvres. Captain Henry Page of the medical department and Mrs. Page, and Lieutenant Douglas MacArthur of the Engineer Corps, will be among the passengers on the transport Sherman next Thursday which carries away the Seventh Infantry. The reception which was given last Thursday evening by General and Mrs. Coolidge in honor of the departing Seventh was one of the most brilliant affairs which have taken place in military circles for a long time.

The Flower Show

There were a few Blingumites among the visitors to the dahlia show in Maple hall last Saturday, but as a whole society did not turn out, though George Pope and Will Crocker were among the exhibitors. George Pope's gardener carried away nearly all the prizes. His dahlias were beautifully arranged, the large dark red varieties shading into the small single pink ones. Sievers, the florist, has a carnation named after Ethel Crocker, and one called "Dr Tevis." Mrs. Frank Carolan, Helen Dean and Paula Wolff also have carnations for namesakes, and Maud Hooper, Miss Schwerin, Will Babcock and Mrs. Allyne have begonias called by their names. It seems it is quite the thing now to have a flower named after one.

To Inherit Millions

One of the wealthiest of the coming debutantes is Miss Marguerite Doe, daughter of Mrs. J. B. Stetson. She will live up to her name for she is an heiress to millions. She is a studious girl, and her ambition is to become an accomplished linguist. She daily takes lessons in both French and Spanish. Her mother hopes that she will have plenty of business sense and she insists upon her daughter managing her small allowance with great care, so that she will be able to guard her fortune when she becomes its mistress. Many a comparatively poor girl has a much larger allowance.

Mrs. W. P. Buckingham's scenes from "The Winter's Tale" were much enjoyed by members of the Ebell of Oakland on Tuesday. Mrs. Buckingham wore a beautiful violet costume. She would give only the two scenes on the program, and could not be persuaded to respond to an encore, though the applause was long and sincere after her number. A large and well-dressed audience was present, all Oakland's swelldom turning out to do honor to "Shakespeare day."

Reflections

OF A BACHELOR GIRL

It was a cynical philosopher who at the beginning of his career determined to pass his life by reflecting upon it. But it requires a brave person to look at life as it really is, to let the mind dwell on the unpleasant realities. I have done so and I am not sorry, for I have avoided the false views of life. I have learned for instance that the good are not always happy, that the virtuous are not always respected, that the honest are not always prosperous, that the disreputable are not always shunned, and that the guilty are not always punished. And yet my reflections have not inspired me with a desire to do the things which my conscience warns me not to do.

It is the polite thing to look at matrimony through rose-colored glasses, to prate about wedded bliss, etc., but I find that the mariage de convenance is the most popular form of matrimony in my set, and I regard it as insipid and vexatious.

The unmarried woman never sheds bitter tears of disillusionment and regret over contrasting the real with the ideal, the imaginary with the actual.

From the false and fleeting security of a Fool's paradise, which begins in deception and ends in despair—good Lord, deliver us.

It is better to hope for nothing and be agreeably surprised than to hope for too much and be grievously disappointed.

Nearly all the men that I consider worth marrying are married, and their wives seem to find solace in the company of other men.

The girl that seeks a husband merely for the purpose of procuring a bread-winner is little better than an adulteress.

It is a mistake to suppose that every man believes that if he can tempt you other men can do the same. The man who entertains such a belief is without pride. The average man likes to flatter himself that he succeeded because he possessed special qualifications that appealed to the woman over whom he cast his spell.

There are many men who want to be fussed over and who require just as much waiting upon as the most spoiled and helpless of women.

If ever I marry it will be in anticipation of the joys of widowhood; the widow has more charms than the bachelor girl after a certain age, merely because she is a widow.

Many married men sigh for the freedom of bachelorhood. They feel that marriage has burdened them with responsibilities and deprived them of a great deal of experience. I fear that if I married I should sigh, too, and for the same reasons.

Some unmarried women go through life fearful that their virtue is always in jeopardy, and they are always telling of their narrow escapes and of the plots of designing and unscrupulous men. Such women have usually not the slightest occasion to take precautions against passionate rogues. It is well to take refuge behind a barbed-wire fence, providing the gates are wide.

Casey Becomes a "Raypublican"

"I see be th' paapers that Roof is in a d'limma," said Casey.

"Phwat's that?" asked Clancy.

"I dinnaw," said Casey, "but I think it's some kind iv gratt. If it wasn't, Roof wouldn't have annything to do with it. There's a wise buckoo, Clancy. That Roof is th' shmartest man that iver turned a thrick in lokile polyticks. Though he's a Jew he can play forty-fives as good as an Irishman. He's a born Capt'in iv Industhry. Lasht year he 'lected Schmitz May-yer iv th' city an' did up the Raypublicans, an' now he's th' biggest Raypublican iv all iv them, and he's stackin' th' car-rds on thim in a way that's a caushin. An' that reminds me that afther this I'm a Raypublican."

"You're jokin'," said Clancy.

"Divil a bit," said Casey. "No more Dimockrissy f'r yer friend Michael Joseph Casey. You're a fool, Clancy, iv you don't become a tur-n-coat like Hinnery Axe, an' Joe Naptallie, an all th' other wise ones. There's too many ole wimmin in the Dimmockrissy an' they're all scratchin' each other's eyes out. Iv you become a Superiorvizer on the Dimmykratick ticket an' shkin a cat for th' tallow it's th' end iv you; the Max Whoppers' an' th' Sammy Brownhards an' th' Throys an' th' Maguires set up a howl that can be heard in Roosha. They all get sore whin they're not in on it. But in th' Raypublican party it's diff'rint: they behave like gintlemen. Ev'ry man's his own grafter an' nobody's allowed to yell murdher whin they're sandbaggin' a coriperashin. Sez th' Raypublican Superiorvizer to himself, sez he, 'I'll take a dollar or two fr'm th' wather company this year,' he sez, 'an' then I'll lay up a heat an' go into business," he sez, 'an' then,' he sez, 'next time I'll run f'r Tax Eater or 'Sessir,' an' he does. An' what happins? Why, he's 'lected, iv coorse. An' ivrybody forgets that when he was a Superiorvizer he'd take anything fr'm a ham up, an' th' pa-apers that roashted him f'r sthealin' publish his pictcher with an' interview with him about what he thinks about the bond issue, just as though he were a leadin' citizen who had niver done things that might have landed him in th' pinitinchery. Could he do it as a Dimmykrat? Indade nit! They'd be whispr'in him to death. Why, they'd shneer at him in church iv a Sunda. What do you think would happen to Roof iv he was a Dimmykrat? Why, he wouldn't get th' benefit iv clergy."

"So now you're a Raypublican?" said Clancy.

"Yes," said Casey, "I know th' side me bread is butther'd on."

Sparkling Musical Comedy

Back on Broadway there is a comedian named Dan Daly, who is so popular with the effete theatregoers of Gotham that he seldom leaves the metropolis. He was here years ago when he was of no importance in the theatrical world, but now he would not deign to cross the continent. He is idolized on Broadway and he stays there on his pedestal. Daly is an emaciated looking fellow and it is said that he has consumption. It appears to be a great effort for him to sing, and he usually recites the songs that fall to him, in a peculiar drawl. You catch the melody only when the chorus joins in. Yet it is the ambition of all the budding comedians on Broadway to imitate Dan Daly, and after witnessing a performance of "The Prince of Pilsen" at the Columbia, I suspect that it is in deference to the vogue of Dan Daly that several of the songs are recited. The practice is one that should be recommended whenever the principals in musical comedy companies can do all the usual things that are required of them except sing. If the lyrics are worth hearing it is distressing to spoil them by bad vocalization. There are no great singers in "The Prince of Pilsen" company, but the musical comedy is the most delightful melange of skirts and ankles, laughter and dance that we have had since "Florodora." And it is accompanied by some sparkling light music. It abounds in fancy dresses, and fantastic dancing, song and satirical jest, tooting and strumming, capering and cavorting. The plot is slender to the point of emaciation and void of anything that appeals to the imagination, but such as it is it is handled with deftness, harmony and a due sense of proportion. But above all the chorus is the thing. Before the first act was half over I looked at the program to discover the name of the genius who had staged this breezy production, and I found that George Marion was the man to whom credit is due. And the credit due is considerable. The chorus is quite a wonder in artistic restraint. It flows quietly in upon the stage at the beck of the leaders of the orchestra, but as though it were in response to some structural necessity of the action. It serves its dramatic purpose, sings its little song, and does its little dance and then ebbs out again. But it is not an apathetic chorus. There is the usual swish and swirl, and pantomimic work that dazzle the eye and give spirit to the performance. It is moreover a chorus of pretty women, and they are all young and appear to enjoy themselves. The leading comedian of the company is Jess Dandy, who has a good German dialect and proves himself to be a clever character actor. Trixie Friganza is the busiest of the women, and she plays the part of a dashing widow as though it comes easy. She is as pleasing to the eye as though she had never suffered the slightest wear and tear of footlight usage. Trixie was out here many years ago with Della Fox. But she has lost none of her sparkle. Our old friend Arthur Donaldson who, with his wife, Florence Walcott, was a member of the Tivoli company several years ago, is the baritone, and he does some capital work as the genuine Prince in cognito. Donaldson is a manly fellow, and he has the face and physique that many a matinee idol might envy. Nick Long and his wife, Idalene Cotton, are conspicuous members of the cast, and they contribute largely to the gayety of the performance.

Two Clever San Franciscans

The autobiography of Nick Long of "The Prince of Pilsen" company would be interesting reading. Long is a San Franciscan born and his father was a pioneer hardware merchant. He was educated at Santa Clara College. Nick used to play when a lad about the entrance to Maguire's opera house, and that is where he acquired a regard for the stage. He followed his bent and after leaving college became a member of the great California theatre stock company. Later he achieved considerable fame as "The Private Secretary" in Gillette's farce. Idalene Cotton, his wife, is also a San Franciscan. Her father was Ben Cotton, the oldtime minstrel.

Comedy at the Alcazar

The acme of realism was reached at the Alcazar Tuesday night. In the last act the clergyman is preparing his sermon to the accompaniment of his servant's yawns. Either the prosiness of the sermon or the sleepy servant inspired a member of the orchestra to dream likewise, and the audience was startled by the sound of a heavy fall. The musician had succumbed to sleep. There is nothing soporific, however, about "The Adventure of Lady Ursula" except what Anthony Hope puts into it purposely. It is one of the most charming comedies of the day, and the Alcazar production compares very pleasantly with those of a few seasons back at the Columbia. Florence Roberts in the rollicking role of the roguish Ursula is delightful. Her comedy has improved immensely since she appeared as Peggy in "The Country Girl." She has gained in dignity and poise. Lucius Henderson is a picture in the picturesque garments of Sir George Sylvester and he acts the role very intelligently. Henderson's work this season is far in advance of anything he has done heretofore.

Take Your Choice

What a time San Franciscans have had in pronouncing the name of D'Annunzio's poetic and passionate "Gioconda." To the naked eye it looks very much as if it ought to be "Gee-o-Conda," which it isn't. The Alcazar box-office applicants who wish to affect higher culture call it "Gi-ocan-da," which usually has the effect of causing the treasurer to pick out tickets for the wrong night and give back too much change. Florence Roberts, who should be an authority, inclines to "Jockunda," but her associate players reveal the courage of their own individual convictions by four separate and distinct brands of pronunciation. The Italian opera singers, from the Tivoli, who besiege the Thursday matinees, to weep over the intellectual pyrotechnics of their gifted compatriot, have their own way of saying it, and who shall dispute them? But it sounds like a yard and a half of spaghetti and is accompanied by moans, sobs, frantic shrugging of shoulders and beating of breasts, all alike wholly beyond the power of reproduction by the native born citizen.

Tip-Top Vaudeville

There is a laugh every second at the Orpheum this week. Comedy reigns supreme and the small boys in the gallery are showing their appreciation in shrill whistles and vigorous handclapping. Falke and Semon seem to be the favorites. They are a musical team who play on all kinds of instruments, including a pipe which allows the player to enjoy a good smoke while practicing the sextet from "Lucia" or "Hiawatha." The climax is reached when Falk removes a hat rack from its fastenings and draws music from its sides. The playlet, "Rehearsing a Tragedy," though somewhat reminiscent of one that Felix Morris used to interpret so charmingly, is withal a very clever comedy. In it Frederick Bond does some excellent work as the long-suffering stage manager, as also does Miss Benton as the society girl who wanted to rival Cissie Loftus. Wood and Ray give some very funny dialogue in their little skit, "A Funny Bunch of Nonsense," and are by far the best burlesquers seen at the Orpheum in many a day. Others on the bill are the Man with Green Gloves, Princess Losrosos, Marlo and Aldo, horizontal bar performers, and Arnesen, a balancing gymnast.

"Ben Hur" Chariot Race

Kolb No Longer Single

Comedian Kolb of Fischer's isn't always spouting dialect to raise laughs. Occasionally he has serious moments. He had some last week, and in the midst of them he took unto himself a wife in the person of Miss Charlotte Vidot, late of the chorus but now one of the principals. He is therefore barred from the ranks of the matinee idol. Mr. Kolb has taken a deep interest in Miss Vidot for a long time, and hence her metamorphosis from a chorus girl into a character actress. Being in love with her it was easier for him to discern that she had talent than it was for the stage manager or anybody else in the house. That is why she has been given some fine opportunities of late. She plays the doll and has a song or two in the current bill, and who knows but what she may have a star part in the next attraction? As a lay figure in the present show Miss Vidot, or technically speaking Mrs. Kolb, is a success. Comedian Dill, the side-partner of the comical Kolb, is a married man of long standing and he has several children, but his wife is not in the profession. Kolb and Dill have been together for many seasons, and they are the best imitators of Weber and Field on the stage. Indeed some people consider them better than the originals.

"Parsifal" Is Hot Stuff

Frau Cosima Wagner is said to have relented somewhat in her effort to prevent the production of "Parsifal" in New York. One of her chief objections to its production outside the revered precincts of Bayreuth was that it was a sacred opera. The latest information about the great music-drama is that it is an erotic version of the Arthurian legends. The second act is said to be "hot stuff." It presents a number of pretty girls in ravishing poses who seek to seduce Parsifal. This act, it is said, will thrill even the jaded and blase New Yorkers. In the text are to be found such sensuous passages as, "Take me upon thy breast," and "let me refresh thy forehead," and "let me kiss thy mouth" and "no, my perfume is the sweetest."

One of Boucicault's Bes

It is a long time since George Webster has had such prominent part in a Central play as in "After Dark." Webster being the theatre's stage director, he has usually allotted himself but modest roles. But this week he plays Old Tom, which role he created in the original New York production of the Boucicault melodrama. And he plays it well, so well that he has to reply to curtain calls without number, especially after the fourth act, climaxed by Old Tom's heroic rescue of Gordon Chumley from a horrible death. There are other thrilling scenes in "After Dark," one where the heroine is cast into the Thames. The company puts plenty of vigor into its interpretation of the various characters. Ernest Howell does a particularly clever bit of work as Dicey Morris, the gambling house keeper. Bright specialties are introduced into the fourth act in the music hall scene. Reyna Belasco gives some delightful dances, full of grace and originality; Myrtle Vane, Myrtle Dingwall and Millar Bacon sing "My Pauline," and the gallery joins in the chorus; and Al Hazzard, a remarkably clever ventriloquist, does a stunt with three amusing dolls, and also sings the Laughing Song with effect. There is also a boxing bout between a juvenile and an adult that is well received.

The Tivoli had the first piece of ill-luck in its grand opera season Monday night when Marchesini had a sore throat and had to defer singing in "Carmen." As a rule it is only Grau prime donne who dare to disappoint audiences. Marchesini wanted to go on in spite of the throat, but her physician positively forbade it. "La Sonnambula" was substituted. "La Traviata" was given Tuesday night.

Klaw and Erlanger's stupendous production of "Ben-Hur" comes to the Grand Opera House in November and will prove the greatest attraction ever brought to the Pacific coast. Three hundred and fifty people will be on the stage in this grand presentation of Gen. Lew Wallace's story. Two special trains will be necessary to transport the large company and vast scenic equipment across the continent from New York. The twenty horses and three camels used in the production will be brought here in specially built cars. Sixteen of the horses are used in the great chariot race scene and the remaining four are carried along in case of illness or accident. No other city in California is to have the production owing to the amount of stage facilities necessary. The engagement at the Grand Opera House will be under the management of Gottlob, Marx and Company.

Shall We Have Real Comic Opera?

William T. Carleton, the veteran basso, lately gave expression to his views on the musical comedies of the day that have driven the oldtime comic opera from the boards. Mr. Carleton echoes a statement that I have frequently made, that there is a large proportion of the public who would gladly welcome a return to the form of entertainment which merited the name of opera comique. He considers it a decided change from the educated taste that enjoyed the Suppe, Genee, Cellier, Strauss, Milloecker, and Gilbert and Sullivan operas, that can fancy such things as "In Gay New York," "The Passing Show," etc. He calls DeKoven, Edwards and Herbert the oases in the desert of degradation that has so long prevailed. He also exempts "The Geisha," "San Toy," "Florodora" and a few others from denunciation. But Carleton's idea is that the public will soon make a loud call for a revival of the comic operas that Alice Oates, Emelie Melville and his own company of a decade ago made popular, and which San Franciscans up to a few years ago were used to hearing at their own Tivoli.

Joining an English opera company is not remunerative. Mr. Manners of the well known London troupe pays tenors eleven dollars a week and baritones and basses about ten dollars—in the chorus, of course. The sopranos and contraltos receive a dollar less than the baritones and basses.

Crowded Houses Continue to Greet Tyndall

There is no diminution in the audiences that greet Dr. Alex. J. McIvor-Tyndall at Steinway hall each Sunday night. It is surprising how the interest in these subjects is growing. Tyndall is always practical and scientific in his lectures, which is probably a surprise to many who imagine that Psychic Science is wholly spiritual and theoretical. Those who attend these Sunday nights, and particularly perhaps those who have joined his class in private instruction, repeatedly assert the practical, personal benefit they derive from Tyndall's teachings. The lecture last Sunday night, on "Hypnotism: Good and Bad," was a concise and logical exposition of the principles and phenomena of that much abused subject. The manifestations of psychic power were the best given this season, and elicited loud applause. Tomorrow evening Tyndall will repeat some of the demonstrations of last Sunday, and will also give some new and startling phases of psychic force. The subject of the lecture will be "What is Clairvoyance?" and it is to be expected that much-needed light will be thrown on the phenomena, or "tricks," whichever it may be, of clairvoyants and mediums. There will also be special demonstrations of the faculty of clairvoyance and thought-transmission. On Sunday evening, October fourth, Tyndall has consented to give his famous lecture, "The Elixir of Life."

Features of Next Week's Bills

Sunday night performances of "The Prince of Pilsen" are to be given during the run of the musical comedy at the Columbia. It will go all next week. "Florodora" comes next.

The little Pollards will appear in "Pinafore" this afternoon at the Grand, and each lady and child in attendance will receive a souvenir photograph of one of the tiny stars. Tonight "The Belle of New York" will be given. James Neill opens his season at tomorrow's matinee and as he is a tremendous favorite in San Francisco he will receive a royal welcome. He appears in "A Gentleman of France," Harriet Ford's dramatization of Weyman's delightful romantic novel, in which Henry III and IV, Valois, Rosny, Turenne and other historical characters disport themselves. De Marsac, the hero, is a sort of D'Artagnan and he has adventures many and varied. There are eight scenes in "A Gentleman of France," each a marvel of the scenic artist's craft. Edythe Chapman will play Mademoiselle de la Vire, and the other roles will be played by Donald Bowles, Clifford Dempsey, George Bloomquest, Jean de Lacey, Reginald Travers, Robert Morris,

John W. Burton, Robert Siddle, Elmer Bloomquest, H. W. Harkness, Morris Cytron, Roy Davis, Robert Banks, Ed. Whitcomb, Lillian Andrews, Edith Campbell, Ruth Hickstein, Gertrude Kellar and Dorothy Sidney. During the Neill season popular prices will prevail. Particular attention is called to the fact that there will be matinees Thursdays, Saturdays and Sundays.

The brilliant engagement of Florence Roberts at the Alcazar enters upon its final fortnight Monday next, with an elaborate revival of "Zaza," that marvelous exposition of the passions by David Belasco. For six weeks during a former engagement Miss Roberts played "Zaza" to a nightly crush of people. Its revival now for a briefer period will find the Alcazar of inadequate capacity to house those of her admirers who regard this personation as her crowning success. D'Annunzio's "Gioconda," poetic, pathetic, exquisitely fine in production, will of course be repeated at the Thursday matinee. It has created a profound impression and marked a great artistic advance in the career of the brilliant California artist, for its fame has extended far beyond our Western boundaries and is thoughtfully approved in the East.

"The Con-curers" and "The Glad Hand" will have but another week at Fischer's; then will come "The Paraders."

The demand for "Carmen" has been so great that the Tivoli will repeat it next week on Tuesday, Thursday and Sunday evenings, with the same cast as this week except that Tina de Spada will be Michaela. Marchesini, who made a distinct hit as Carmen despite a cold, has nearly recovered and should be at her best next week. Ischierdo and Zanini do excellent work as Don Jose and Escamillo. In "The Barber of Seville," the alternating bill, Adelina Tromben will sing the leading soprano part of Rosina and the Figaro will be presented by Adam Gregoretti. Alfredo Tedeschi, the young tenor, is cast for Count Almaviva.

At the Central next Monday evening will open a season of comedy, for which L. R. Stockwell has been specially engaged, and in which he will be assisted by all the favorites of the excellent stock. Of all the plays written by Charles A. Hoyt, "A Temperance Town" is one of the very cleverest. It has had record runs in all the big cities of the East, and people who have seen it are not satisfied until they have seen it again. At popular prices it should fill the Central from the footlights to the doors all next week. Stockwell will appear in his original role of Launcelot Jones, better known as "Mink, the town drunkard," a part that furnishes uproarious fun, and yet has a noble and pathetic side.

"Uncle Tom's Cabin" has reached the vaudeville stage and will be seen in motion pictures at the Orpheum. Myles McCarthy, conceded the legitimate successor of William Scanlan, will make his vaudeville debut in this city, assisted by Miss Aida Woolcott, in "The Race Tout's Dream." Alexius, who gives a wonderful exhibition of sensation and daring while mounted upon an ordinary safety bicycle, will make his first appearance here. Al Carleton and Williard Terre, who appear in a singing and talking act, "A String Town Yap," will also be new. Paula and Dika, who delighted Orpheum audiences five years ago with their Parisian singing and dancing act, return from abroad with "A French Frappe."

At the Chutes will be Larkins and Patterson, "National Singers of Coon songs"; the Freeze brothers, jugglers and dancers of renown; Louie Dacre, known as "the funny lady," in her original monologue; the Grierson sisters in song and dance; and Excella, a young and pretty contortionist.

The "Everyman" company will produce "Twelfth Night" on Monday and Tuesday evenings of next week, and Tuesday afternoon, at Lyric hall. The play will be acted "as Shakespeare wrote it," and of course will be minus the scenery to which we have become accustomed. It is sure to be very interesting. Teachers and students may obtain tickets at reduced rates by applying at the box office.

Harrigan Scores Again

That perennial character actor, Ned Harrigan, whose popularity in New York was at one time as great as that now enjoyed by Weber and Field, is once more on the top-wave. He has written a new piece, "Under Cover," which was produced last week at the Murray Hill and which has scored a hit. George Braham, a son of "Dave" Braham who wrote the music for all of Mr. Harrigan's earlier successes, composed the melodies for the new songs which have caught the public fancy. One of them, entitled "The Fringe of Society," is sung by Jennie Yeamans. It is a characteristic Harrigan ditty. Each verse describes one of the curious collection of characters gathered at a cheap east side lodging house. Here is a sample:

"Oh! there is a gent whose money was spent
On Wall street, near Trinity's chimes.
He juggled with shares, and now millionaires
They pay him a nickel for shines.
It's known all about that he's down and out.
He's dead to the world—do you see?
Oh! he's had his chance, now he's in the dance,
With "The Fringe of Society."

"Now there's a peach, thrown up on the beach,
A life wreck from poverty's sea;
So youthful and gay, this poor castaway
Would sooner drink whisky than tea.
She don't know her name, and she's not to blame;
There's millions in her family;
Oh! yes, it is sad; we're all to the bad
In 'The Fringe of Society.'"

Something About "The Paraders"

On Monday evening, October fifth, Fischer's will raise the curtain on "The Paraders." "The Paraders" affords comedy parts for the comedians that are different from anything seen heretofore. The situations supporting the comedy are said to be natural, with laughable climaxes and local sentiment that will unquestionably please because the play is located in California. Raymond W. Peck, author of the play and lyrics, is assisting in the production of the piece, and Robert Hood, composer of the music, is teaching the musical numbers and will conduct the orchestra. The play will be staged by Charles H. Jones late of the Rogers Brothers shows at the Grand. The music will be heard for the first time in any theatre in this city.

Maxine Elliott has been so seriously ill in New York that she had to withdraw from rehearsals of her new play, "Her Own Way." In trying to reduce her weight last summer she resorted to severe training with the result that she has been afflicted with neuritis. Nat Goodwin was alarmed about her condition a few days ago.

Eavis Thall on the Stage

Miss Eavis Thall, daughter of the late Mark Thall of the Alcazar, has gone on the stage in New York. She was quite prominent in local musical circles and also in Jewish society. She has begun her stage career in Francis Wilson's company. She is a young woman of considerable talent and of a most agreeable personality, and her friends are confident that she will make rapid strides in her chosen profession.

Exceptional interest will attach to the debut of the new Alcazar stock company on October twelfth, when a very beautiful play, "Lady Bountiful," by so distinguished an author as Arthur Wing Pinero, will have its first San Francisco hearing. The important newcomers are Adele Black, leading woman; James Durkin, leading man; Frances Starr, ingenue; John B. Maher, character comedian, assisted by the pick of the recognized favorites. The Alcazar has established a delightfully high standard within the past few months and the ambition of the management is to steadily continue along the line of fine and artistic achievement.

Frank Bacon is making a great hit on the northern circuit in his rural play "Hills of California." —The Playgoer.

MUSIC

[Communications addressed to this department should be received not later than Wednesday noon.]

The Polyglot Entertainment

An unwonted melange of tongues pervaded Steinway hall on Thursday evening of last week. Crisp French vied with liquid Italian and gliding Spanish. The occasion was the first entertainment of the Polyglot Club. A program of unusual excellence was presented. The most striking of the literary numbers was the reading of the episode of Francesca di Rimini by Miss Grace Llewellyn Jones. Miss Jones herself was a picture in her flowing white gown, and might have been in her own person some Leonora or Lucrezia of Italian story. Her delivery of the great Florentine's terza rima was most exquisite. For the benefit of those unfamiliar with the original she prefaced her reading by an English translation. Senorita Alicia Cuenca recited two Spanish selections, "En un Album" by Juan de Dios Perza and the very charming "Que es Poesia" by Gustave Becquer. Senorita Cuenca's sincere and unaffected manner won for her the immediate favor of the audience. Another of the Spanish numbers was an original poem recited by the author, Senor Rafael de Zayas Enriquez, a masterly effort which obtained for the poet well-deserved applause. Professor Ventura was down for some Italian readings, which he delivered with his usual earnestness and enthusiasm. The musical part of the entertainment was quite up to the high level of the literary portion. Signor Borghesi rendered two baritone solos with excellent voice and style, Cantor Stark gave a spirited rendition of Schumann's "Two Grenadiers," and Cantor Davis was delightful in "Sans Toi" and Rubinstein's ever beautiful "Der Asra." Signor Ursomando achieved a signal triumph by his Liszt solo, "Apres une Lecture de Dante," which very appropriately followed Miss Jones's reading. The composition is a fantasia in the sonata form and is very Lisztian in character. Signor and Signora Ursomando were also heard in a Mendelssohn duo later in the evening. Senor Martinez was the accompanist of the soloists. The program was unique and in all respects a credit to the club.

It was by special request of Professor Ventura that Cantor Stark sang the Schumann song, but the latter tells me he is never going to sing "The Three Grenadiers" again, no matter how many "special desires" come in his mail-bag. He gave it at three affairs last week, by request, and whenever he goes out to spend an evening he is always asked for that song. He fancies concert-goers will think he knows no other, though as a matter of fact he has a large repertory of classic songs. Many popular singers have found themselves up against this same hard proposition.

Trinity Choir to Produce a New Oratorio

At the Worcester Musical Festival (England) in 1896 considerable interest was aroused by the presentation of a new oratorio by Edward Elgar, one of the masters of song. And now San Francisco is to hear the same oratorio, which Trinity choir under the direction of Mr. Louis Eaton has been preparing for weeks past. The soloists will be Miss Millie Flynn, soprano, Miss Una Fairweather, contralto, Newell E. Vinson, tenor, P. J. Olssen, baritone, Arthur Morgenstern, basso. The program of next Sunday's musical service at eight o'clock will therefore be a very brilliant one, as nothing quite so important in musical undertaking has probably ever been given by any choir in this city.

She's Appreciated in London

Zelie de Lussan is again singing Carmen in London, and the English critics have again said, "She gives more satisfaction in the role than any other artist on the English operatic stage." When she appeared at the Tivoli a short time ago she failed to draw as well as Collamarini had drawn. The reason was that people supposed that because she was singing at popular prices she was no longer a great artist. The fact was that she sang as well as ever she did, but the theatregoers of San Francisco are like sheep. If some critic who affects a knowledge of music, and who indulges in the technology of the art to give vraisemblance to his screeds, tells them that something in the musical line is good, they promptly flock to hear and applaud. If he should say it was bad they would either not go or else they would merely drop in just to damn it. San Francisco is filled with music lovers but those people who really know something of the art of music are very rare in this neck of the woods. The best evidence of this fact is that among our professional singers are several who evoke great enthusiasm whenever they appear at an entertainment, and who know as little about the vocal art as a hog does about the precession of the equinoxes.

Scheel's Players Have an Off Day

The symphony concert of last Tuesday was, as a whole, the least enjoyable of a very successful series. There was a large something lacking in the noble Beethoven number with which the program opened. The men, to use a hack phrase, failed to rise to the dignity of the occasion. Too much praise had, perhaps, made them indifferent; and Beethoven may not be slighted. San Francisco is not hypercritical in matters of art, but to play such misuc as if one wanted to get through with it and go out and have a drink has a far from happy effect upon even the dullest audience. In the Haydn symphony (D major), music suggestive of laughing trout streams or winds at play, the men, again, failed to rise to the delicacy of the occasion. However, Directors, I suppose, like other divinities, have their off-days. Mr. Otto Spamer, in the Ernst "Violin Concerto," had for a time the house, so to speak, by the ears; and even after he had given, for encore, the "Album-leaf" of Wagner-Wilhelmj, the audience seemed loath to let him go. Massenet's "The Last Dream of the Virgin" of course delighted the women. As for the Richard Strauss and Von Reynicek numbers, they were new and interesting, but nothing more. I would give five copper cents (not a nickel, mind you) for Mr. Scheel's private opinion of the whole performance.

There will be no symphony concert next week, but on October sixth the final one of the series will be given. The musicians found that with the grand opera season and other demands on their services they could not give proper attention to the symphony rehearsals, hence the postponement.

At the final concert will be given Karl Goldmark's symphony, "A Rustic Wedding"; also for the first time in public, Dr. H. J. Stewart's music from the musical drama of "Montezuma." This music made a deep impression at the Bohemian Club midsummer jinks and has been placed upon the program in response to the requests of many musical critics, and artists in whose estimation it is a most remarkable composition. In its color and descriptive quality this music is said to surpass anything that has been done by American composers. The prelude, "Darkness and Dawn," is a bit of descriptive music which, depicting, as it does, the rising sun, will be listened to with great interest, especially by those who heard Mascagni's "Iris," the theme of both compositions being practically the same.

The Loring Club

The twenty-seventh season of the Loring Club opened most auspiciously. The club was in good voice, and has evidently profited by its summer's rest. The program opened with an onerous number, Hoffmann's cantata, "Harold's Bridal Voyage," given in its entirety, Mr. Herbert Medley carrying the solos. The club was fully equal to the exactions of this difficult number, and the rendition was marked by spirit and intelligence. A string quintet by Volkman folowed, the dainty waltz of the suite being redemanded for an encore. "The Long Day Closes" (Arthur Sullivan) was given with fine expression, thus closing the first part of the program. Part second opened with a novelty, John Hyatt Brewer's "Break, Break" for male chorus and accompaniment of piano, organ, strings, flute, two clarinets and two horns, the composer having scored the accompaniment expressly for the Loring Club. This composition has only been heard once before in the United States, having been recently given in New York with great success. It is a most beautiful number, full of choice harmony, and was fully appreciated by the audience who would fain have had it repeated. The soloist of the evening was Mrs. Birmingham, who was heard in several songs. She was particularly good in Clarence Lucas's "Madchenherz" and in her later numbers, the Nevins song and Victor Harris's "Madrigal." The club rendered a number of smaller numbers in excellent style, among them the folk-song "My Liesel" and the old Vogel Waltz Song which was never better done, and which appropriately closed a well chosen and well executed program. Miss Ruth Loring, the pianiste, was as ever beyond cavil and her good work contributed not a little to the success of Hoffmann's difficult cantata. Mr. David

"Anne Carmel"

It is a long way from an Arizona army post to a primitive Canadian village, but Gwendolen Overton shows herself equally at home in both. "Anne Carmel" is a story quite aside from the beaten track, and though the book has been compared with Gilbert Parker's novels because of its Canadian environment and with "The Mill on the Floss" because of the love of the brother and sister, it neither resembles nor suggests anything that either Gilbert Parker or George Eliot has given us. Jean Carmel is the cure of the village of St. Hilaire, and his household is made up of himself, his widowed mother, and his sister, some twelve years younger than himself. Into the primitive life of the community comes one Harnett, an Englishman idling his days in fishing and hunting, and Anne, the cure's sister, who is as much misplaced as Jean in her intellectual surroundings, without having his perpetual round of duties to occupy her, speedily falls a victim to the blandishments of the stranger. This is no ordinary story of the innocent villager betrayed by the scheming villain, for Anne, though innocent enough, is not by any means ignorant of the consequences of the step she proposes to take. Harnett is a poor specimen of humanity, entirely selfish and indifferent to anything but his own ease. He is the heir of an uncle who has already planned a marriage, and Harnett, while he is unwilling to marry Anne and so cut himself off from wealth and position, is equally unwilling to give her up, and he persuades her to see things as he does. Anne is above hypocrisy. According to her reasoning her soul is her own, to save or lose according to her inclination, and she thinks it is a case of being well lost. Jean has early learned that there is but one way to govern this strong-willed sister of his—to put her on her honor, and accordingly, when she goes to him and tells him what she is determined upon, he, finding that she is not amenable to reason, exacts a promise of her that when, as it will inevitably turn out, her lover tires of her, she will return to her brother's protection, and trusts to time to be his ally. There is only one way to account for Anne's infatuation, the isolation and loneliness of her life. Jean has his trials of the flesh also, and eventually it is the mutual love of brother and sister which saves both. Aside from the main story, Jean Carmel is an excellent type of the good curate, with his plans for the betterment of his parish without a too violent upheaval of their inherited ways, and his love of children and wise management of his little flock. As might have been expected from "A Heritage of Unrest," "Anne Carmel" is one of the books to be reckoned with. Gwendolen Overton is too well known, locally, at all events, for it to be necessary to go into any extended account of her style or strength as a writer. The Macmillan Company are the publishers of the book, which is illustrated by Arthur I. Kellar.

A Satire on Society

In "Hearts Aflame" Louise Winter has written a clever satire on that portion of the smart set who ignore all the commandments except the eleventh. The book neither preaches nor teaches directly but we are left to draw our own inferences from facts. The plot deals chiefly with a beautiful society leader and her efforts to reinstate a friend in the social world, after a sensational divorce, a marriage with her co-respondent and a too speedy return to New York. Apparently this is a good picture of the class with which it deals, the people with money, but with neither intellect nor ancestry. They can entertain delightfully, for they all have millions, or the appearance of it, and they draw the line at nothing but being caught. Husbands are discarded with as little regret as old gloves are cast aside, and without a phenomenal memory or a note-book no one of them could be certain of the other's name a year ago. Music hall singers and social lights are in competition for the favors of club millionaires, and sets of Russian sables and diamond jewelry are sent anonymously, and accepted and worn without a thought of anything mattering beyond their value. Novelty and money are the passwords to the graces of the set, and they vie with each other for the attentions of their chosen males as openly as unsophisticated school girls. There is abundance of wit and epigram in the conversations, the thrust and parry that is necessary to the preservation of life in such an environment. As a bit of summer reading the book will serve to pass an hour or two pleasantly enough, which is apparently all the author designed in writing it. [Published by the Smart Set Company.]

Nothing better of their kind than General King's stories of garrison life and Indian warfare have ever been written, and it is doubtful if there is any other writer capable of doing just this same work, for General King knows his subject and his environment and he is stirred by neither the fury of the non-combatant nor the sickly sentimentality of the philanthropist who knows not the soldier nor the Indian. It will therefore be grateful news to those readers who appreciate his work to learn that he will shortly publish a new novel entitled "An Apache Princess." It promises to be quite as interesting as "A Daughter of the Sioux," published a year ago and still in good demand—something worth noting in these days when the life of a best-seller averages less than three months. There are plots within plots, garrison tangles, Indian uprisings, treachery and loyalty, and all the contrasts and complications which go to the working out of a plot such as Colonel King is fond of weaving. Illustrations are to be by Remington and Deming and the book promises to be one of more than common interest.

"Man with the Iron Mask." According to her theory, Charles I of England was not beheaded, in spite of the testimony of witnesses. A faithful friend who closely resembled the ill-fated monarch took his place, and Charles was enabled to make his escape to France. He was captured at Dunkirk by Louis XIV, and imprisoned, and his identity concealed by means of the historical mask. Of course Madame Wagemann is entitled to air her opinions, but it is disconcerting to people of middle age to look back over the long list of historical, geographical and philosophical "facts" which were drilled into their heads and to discover now, that they are if not actually disproved, at least doubtful. It puts one in sympathy with the small boy who announced his intention of not learning another thing "till they were sure about it."

Of Interest to Women

A pamphlet of some twenty pages entitled "The Community Property of Husband and Wife" has been issued by the Paul Elder Company, and brief as it is, it should command the attention of all women, whether married or only indefinitely contemplating marriage. Its publication has grown out of the discussion of the rights of married women in community interests as brought up at the Los Angeles convention a few years ago, and the appointment of a committee to take steps to so amend the California laws that the rights of husbands and wives in the community property shall be equal. As it is at present, the whole of the community property passes to the husband on the death of the wife unless there has been a judicial decree setting apart to her a portion of the estate, which she is then at liberty to dispose of by will. On the other hand, if the husband dies only one-half of the community property goes to the wife. While the husband has absolute control of his half of the community estate under all circumstances, the wife cannot will her share even to her own children, so that it is not an infrequent occurrence that a mother works hard to help accumulate property, and then dies leaving her children to the tender mercies of their father, who marries again, and in the course of time forgets or ignores his obligation to his children and the property which he owes to the industry and frugality of their mother passes to the new wife or to his relatives. The pamphlet, which contains a brief history of the manner in which the community of property interests has been brought about, as well as comments on the present aspect of the California law, has been prepared by a well-known local lawyer. It is not to be confused with those numerous treatises which profess to teach every woman to act as her own advocate, and thereby promote legal entanglements, for it is only a plain statement of facts and the exact position in which every married woman stands with respect to property, even to the clothes which cover her back. It is for sale by the Paul Elder Company for the insignificant sum of twenty-five cents, and a purchase and perusal may save women from making agreements which will cost them many times twenty-five dollars.

An Entertaining Juvenile

In "A Partnership in Magic" Charles Battell Loomis has written a first-rate juvenile for the little chaps who have not yet outgrown fairy tales. A little lad of twelve years, motherless, and with a cynical skinflint of a stepfather, suddenly and by accident discovers that he possesses a magical gift of plucking ripe fruit in midwinter from any tree. The stepfather tries to take advantage of the supernatural gift of the child, who runs away from the farm and goes to New York to "make his fortune." Bob lacks imagination and does not make the best of his opportunities until he meets with another boy of about double his years, with whom he rents an empty store with a small back yard in which is a tree, and proceeds to supply the metropolis with choice fruit out of season, until the magic power is withdrawn. The fruit business is the large item, but the little country lad has any number of other adventures, such as dining in a swell restaurant, being run over by an automobile and robbed by a tramp. The stepfather, of course, has no intention of letting such a prize slip out of his guardianship, so he follows Bob to New York, and adds his share to the excitement. Primarily the book is meant for small boys, but older readers will also find interest in it, and they may read the allegory which Mr. Loomis has wisely kept in the background. "A Partnership in Magic" may be included in the too short list of juveniles in which proper attention has been given to the manner of writing. Authors are apt to be overcareless in their construction of sentences and choice of words. The effect of trying to read their books is much the same as that of walking in a narrow foot-path plentifully supplied with stones on which to stub one's toes and wiregrass over which to stumble. Parents who are keeping in mind the Christmas stockings can safely place "A Partnership in Magic" on the list for any of the little folks who have not reached the age of realism and sophistication when there are no more giants, or fairies, or miracles. Ideal suburban property, beautifully situated in Marin county on the N. S. R. R. Completely sheltered by Mount Tamalpais from ocean winds and fogs. Extensive water works, sewerage and electric light systems. Attractions abound—such as sea-bathing, boating, groves of redwood, madrone and laurel, picturesque walks and drives, sunshine and wildwood vistas. The wonderful equability of the climate cannot be surpassed; flowers bloom perennially. The journey from San Francisco is short, enjoyable and full of interest. You can have a charming country home at a moderate price, and on easy terms.

W. Loring conducted. At the third concert of the season John Knowles Paine's "Oedipus Tyrannus" will be produced with a full orchestra, and the spoken parts read by a prominent professor. The music was especially composed for the production of the tragedy at Harvard, and at the time received the highest praise from critics and musicians. Its rendition by the Loring Club will be anticipated with much interest.

Miss Parlow's Concert

Kathleen Parlow, violin virtuoso, age twelve summers, ought to be a proud girl. On the evening of the seventeenth she again gave the music lovers of San Francisco evidence of her remarkable talent by playing admirably a program of which not the biggest of her fellow artists need be ashamed—Max Bruch, Bach, Paganini, Brahms-Joachim, Ernst, Mendelssohn. She received an ovation, and she deserved it. Your eyes tell you that she is a tall slip of a girl, with a tangle of artistic hair framing a face intended for large things. Your ears would lead you to believe that you were listening to what a man, by means of the subtlest of musical instruments, had to say to you of the joys and sorrows of life. Miss Parlow's playing is a fact for the Theosophists. Mrs. Blanchard sang her numbers well; and to say that Fred Maurer was at the piano is to say everything for that part of the program.

Manager Will Greenbaum announces for the opening of the concert season at the Lyric hall the young American pianiste, Augusta Cottlow, who created a veritable sensation here some years ago when she appeared as a child. Mr. Natorp Blumenfeld, a talented young violinist, has been specially engaged for these concerts, which will take place the evenings of October thirteenth and fifteenth, and the afternoon of October seventeenth. A concert will also be given at the Unitarian church, Oakland, Friday, October sixteenth. Among the numbers on the program will be Beethoven's "Kreutzer Sonata" and other important works. Mr. Greenbaum promises some fine musical attractions for the coming season including the great contralto, Madame Schumann-Heink.

Leschetitzky's Birthday Party

Leschetitzky celebrated his birthday recently, and one of his pupils wrote this account home to her family about the affair: "Nearly every one carried flowers, and as the professor came into the room we all made a semi-circle about him and threy our bouquets at his feet. The little boy wonder (a lad of seven years) brought up a big bouquet of flowers and gave them to him, making a little speech as he did so. The professor responded and shook hands with a great number of the pupils. Soon the photographer assembled us all together and we crowded about the professor, who sat at the piano. While the photographer was getting us arranged the professor kept us in peals of laughter with his funny remarks. At one trying minute he gave the bugle call on the piano, as he does so often in class when he wants us to get quiet, and another time he favored us with a first Czerny exercise. Supper was served about ten. There were four kinds of drink, and the professor's health was drunk with each. A toast would be given and we would all crowd around him and tip glasses with him. He was a darling. Thinking the people of the side table had no opportunity to tip glasses with him, he got up and went around to them so they could. After supper we all got the autograph craze and the poor professor wrote his name on nearly every menu in the room. We had songs by different people, and Grunfeld played. Then we danced. Different people played for us to dance—Grunfeld, a Russian pianist, Miss Newcomb, a newspaper critic, Leschetitzky, etc. When Leschetitzky did not play he danced. They were all waltzes, and went so fast it made you dizzy to look at the dancers."

Andrew Bogart Back

Andrew Bogart has returned to San Francisco after a long absence in the East, and intends remaining here, at least for a time. Mr. Bogart is by all odds the best baritone San Francisco ever sent away to win laurels abroad. His voice and style class him with Haydon Coffin, who is still the most popular high baritone in light opera. Andrew Bogart sings only in concerts, recitals and drawing-rooms but had he desired he could easily have become the rival of Haydon Coffin in the latter's field. He is a master of classic song, and his diction is faultless. It is a long time since Mr. Bogart has been heard here and everybody is very eager to hear him again.

Mrs. Louise Marriner Campbell will shortly give her "Talk" —"What I Heard and Saw in the Vocal Studios of Paris"—before the Council of Jewish Women. The Talk is racy, breezy, to the point and of interest to those who desire to protect the American girl abroad. Mrs. Campbell adds to the interest of the presentation by a program of songs rendered by her advanced pupils. She has given the Talk before the Century, California, Channing Auxiliary, Irving, Mills College, Adelphian and Ebell clubs.

Next Thursday evening in Lyric hall Madame Fabbri-Mueller will give a Wagner Festival. It is on this date that the monument erected to Wagner will be unveiled in Berlin. Madame Mueller is one of the honorary members of the Wagner Committee. Joseph Beringer, another member of the committee, will take part in the local festival.

Automobile Topics

The automobilist who thinks that he has made a record of some sort these days should inquire before boasting. Records are being established every day. Last week I stated that Major J. Fulmer of Los Angeles was the first automobilist to successfully tour the Yosemite Valley. I am informed that trips through the valley were made over three years ago in Locomobiles by Dr. Clark of Haywards, Miles Baird and Albert C. Aitken of this city and Oliver Lippincott of Los Angeles.

All interest now among the San Francisco automobilists centres in the race meet of the Automobile Club of California on the Ingleside track next month. The event promises to be the biggest in the history of automobiling in Western America. Not only will machines from various points on the coast participate but also many Eastern racing cars. Charles B. Shanks, who is looking out for the racing interests of the Winton people this year is expected to arrive in San Francisco some time next week. While here Mr. Shanks will arrange for the big Winton racing cars to come to the coast this season to compete in the race meet on the seventh and eighth of November. Should Oldfield not come to the coast the Winton people will send out another racing man to run their cars. Cuyler Lee of the Western Automobile Company will have a speedy Cadillac in which to enter the race meet. The Pacific Motor Car Company will receive next month a special four cylinder Packard racing machine and a Cudell racer in preparation for the November race. Harold B. Larzalere is to drive the Packard in the meet. Frank A. Garbutt will no doubt be up from Los Angeles to race his White cars and W. Parker Lyon, president of the Fresno Automobile Club and the recent purchaser of Fred Hotaling's prize-winning Winton, has signified his intention of entering his car.

With the blue of the heavens, and the twinkling stars, and the palms and oleanders of Kearney avenue, Fresno, for their bridal decorations, and an automobile flying at the rate of thirty miles an hour chuff-chuffing the wedding march, I. C. Woodward and Mrs. A. Franklin, both of Los Angeles, clasped hands and vowed to love, honor and cherish each other until death. W. Parker Lyon, president of the Fresno Automobile Club, officiated as best man and S. N. Griffith as bridesmaid—at least he stood by Parker while the ceremony was going on. The Rev. Duncan Wallace acted as the chauffeur to start the couple on their journey of life. Lyon had driven his car about seven miles before it was decided to begin the ceremony. Then the speed lever was turned to the thirty-mile notch, the pastor, the witnesses and the bridal couple stood up and the solemn words of the ceremony were pronounced. Talk of being married in haste—this one was speedy enough for anybody. It is no doubt one of the fastest weddings on record and the first one to take place in an automobile.

Mr. John D. Spreckels utilized both of his "White" touring cars for a run through Alameda county last Sunday. The party left on the nine o'clock boat from San Francisco, ran down through San Leandro, Haywards, Niles, and up a dozen miles into the Niles canyon. The return was made in time to catch the four o'clock boat back to San Francisco. Mr. Spreckels drove one car, and with him in it were Miss Lillie Spreckels, Miss Helen Wagner and Mr. Athole McBean. The other car was driven by Mr. W. J. Wagner; with him were Miss Grace Spreckels, Mr. Wood and Mr. Wright. Miss Dolbeer also accompanied the party in her machine, taking with her Miss Warren, Mr. Frank Goad and Dr. Zeile. Mr. John D. Spreckels has purchased his second "White" touring car; it is finished in black and red, with red upholstery, and is one of the handsomest the White Company ever turned out. Mr. Spreckels expects to keep one car here and the other at Coronado.

Mr. and Mrs. A. A. Moore Jr. have returned from their Eastern trip. They spent some time in the quaint city of Quebec, and visited the Thousand Islands. While in New York Mr. Moore purchased a five thousand dollar Locomobile, his recent accident not having cooled his ardor.

Mr. Frank Miner expects to make a tour of the State in his Runnymede, which is now being made ready by the Pacific Motor Car Company.

Miss Bertha Dolbeer took a trip to Niles Canyon last week in a large Packard touring car.

Mr. Harry Holbrook has added a St. Louis to his stable of automobiles. —The Chauffeur.

YOU ARE HEREBY DIRECTED to appear and answer in an action entitled as above, brought against you in the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, within ten days after the service on you of this Summons—if served within this County; or within thirty days if served elsewhere.

And you are hereby notified that, unless you appear and answer as above required, the said Plaintiff will take judgment for any money or damages demanded in the complaint as arising upon contract or he will apply to the Court for any other relief demanded in this complaint.

That the property involved in and affected by said action is described as follows, to wit:

All that certain lot, piece or parcel of land, situate, lying and being in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, commencing at a point where the Northerly line of Union street intersects the Easterly line of Dupont street; thence running Easterly along said line of Union street Twenty-three (23) feet; thence at right angles Northerly Thirty-four (34) feet and four and one-half (4½) inches thence at right angles Westerly Twenty-three (23) feet to the said Easterly line of Dupont street, and thence Southerly and along said line of Dupont street Thirty-four (34) feet and four and one half (4½) inches to the point of commencement.

That the object of said action is to obtain a judgment and decree of the above entitled Court adjudging and determining that the above named defendants and all other persons claiming any right, title, estate, lien or interest in the real property described in the plaintiff's complaint adverse to plaintiff's ownership or any cloud upon plaintiff's title thereto have not, and that none of them has any estate, right, title, lien or interest whatever in or to said real property, or in or to any part or parcel thereof, and that the title of plaintiff is good and valid, and that said defendants and all of said persons unknown as aforesaid be forever enjoined and debarred from asserting any claim whatever in or to said real property, or in or to any part or parcel thereof adverse to the plaintiff, and for such other further and additional relief as to the Court may seem meet and proper in the premises, and for costs of suit.

Mrs. Frankan, the author of "Pigs in Clover," is very quick in conversational give-and-take. The story was lately told of her that at a breakfast party with Cecil Rhodes, Spencer Eddy was boasting about his sporting prowess.

"I shot twenty-seven hares this morning," he began.

"That absurd little Yankee," interrupted Mrs. Frankan in a loud whisper, "must have been shooting at a wig."

If there is one thing more uncertain even than the verdict of a jury—if there is one thing which is known neither in heaven, earth nor hell, and which angels and demons alike waste time in guessing at—it is what style of woman any man will fancy and select for his wife. It is utterly impossible to predict what matrimonial caprice may or may not seize even the wisest, most experienced, most practicable and reasonable of men; and I would sooner undertake to conjecture how high the thermometer stands at this instant on the crest of Mount Copernicus up yonder in the moon, than attempt to guess what freak will decide a man's choice of a bride.—Mrs. Murray in "St. Elmo," Augusta Evans.

From "A Country Doctor," by Sarah Orne Jewett:

To love benefits one's self and to inspire love benefits others. (Quoted.)

After one has followed a certain course for some time, everything seems to persuade one that no other is possible.

While a man's life is strengthened by his domestic happiness, a woman's must either surrender itself wholly, or relinquish entirely the claims of such duties, if she would achieve distinction or satisfaction elsewhere. The two cannot be taken together in a woman's life as in a man's. One must be made of lesser consequence though the very notions of both domestic and professional life need all the strength which can be brought to them. —The Gleaner.

Club Cocktails

The art of cocktail mixing is to so blend the ingredients that no one is evident, but the delicate flavor of each is apparent. Is this the sort of cocktail the man gives you who does it by guesswork? There's never a mistake in a CLUB COCKTAIL. It smells good, tastes good, is good—always. Just strain through cracked ice. Seven kinds—Manhattan, Martini, Vermouth, Whiskey, Holland Gin, Tom Gin and York.

The Phone and The Lady

Scene: Mrs. Youngwidow's boudoir.

Characters: Mrs. Youngwidow, her maid, and Mrs. Y's admirer.

Mrs. Youngwidow has just returned from a shopping tour.

Mrs. W.: What is that, Hortense? Mr. Carter rang up? What did he say? Where was he? You do not know? Why didn't you ask? Well, I will wait awhile and see if he rings again.

(Takes off wrap and hat.)

On second thoughts, Hortense, it may have been something important. Go and call the Club. Don't say who wants to speak to him. I wouldn't let anybody know the matter was of importance.

(Sits down and takes up book.)

Hortense! What, not at the Club? Never mind, then. I guess it was nothing.

(Tears fly-leaf from book nervously.)

Are you sure he left no message, Hortense? You see I haven't seen him for a week, and I feel rather worried about him. I was quite cross and disagreeable that night—still we did not part enemies.

(Twists rings on her fingers nervously.)

Hortense—try the Palace. He may be there. Don't leave a message—wait, leave my number. If he comes in tell them to call me up. * * * He was there but has gone out? Left number and message? Oh, I wish you hadn't. He may think now that I cared. And I wouldn't let him know for the world. It is never best, Hortense, to let a man know you care.

(Takes up magazine and turns pages listlessly.)

Hortense, did they say where he'd gone? To the Club? Why didn't you say so before? * * * Call the Club again, Hortense. I must know what he had to say. * * * This suspense is killing me. You stupid creature. Next time a man rings me up when I'm out, if you don't take the message, I shall send you away. Do you hear, Hortense?

(Walks up and down room, impatiently.)

How long she is getting that number! Hortense—Hortense! Call Central, call anything; but get that number at once. Not there? Why, you said he was there a moment ago.

(Throws herself on couch and weeps in the cushions.)

I am sure he will never forgive me for being out. Men are so impatient—and he knows so many other women. Perhaps he has Miss Swell dining with him now.

(Wipes away tears and rises.)

Hortense, I tell you what. Call up Pierre's and ask if Mr. Carter is dining there tonight. No, I did not say leave my number. If he's there—I'm sure he is—tell him to come at once to the phone.

(Looks out of window.)

There's a man in a cab with a woman. It looks like Miss Swell. I know it is he with her. Oh, what deceivers men are! What, Hortense? Not at Pierre's? Well, where can he be? Ring up the hotel again. Oh, why didn't you tell him I would be back for dinner? Hortense, if I knew how, I'd swear at you, I would, really. What's that? A man coming up the front steps? Mr. Carter? Very well, tell him I am not at home. I shall not see him. What does he mean by calling on me without letting me know beforehand? * * * There, she's gone! She's so quick. Why didn't she wait?

(Goes to door.)

Hortense, don't tell him that. Tell him—tell him I am dressing to go out to dinner and if he cares to wait half an hour, I will see him for a minute. * * * Wait—no, Hortense, tell him—

(Enter Mr. Carter.)

Oh, darling, where have you been this long dreary week?

(His arms are around her, her lips pressed to his.)

Some Startling Assertions

Archbishop Montgomery made some startling and bold assertions in his address to the large audience assembled in the new Greek amphitheatre at Berkeley last Friday. They were startling and bold because they were made in the presence of people who had assembled to glorify an educational institution whose system was condemned by the speaker. However, it was a very tactful and polite address, and the speaker's argument is not to be easily controverted. It was in support of a plea for State aid for all schools, public, private and parochial. He contended that religion cannot be taught in any public school, because the State has no religion and consequently cannot teach religion or order it taught by any one. But he urged that the State should widen its system and cease to make a monopoly of secular instruction to the extent of exacting that public money be paid for secular instruction in those schools only where only secular instruction is given. It should assume supervision of secular education wherever taught, and not object to the introduction of religious teaching. The result of this system would be that people who believe in dogmatic religion revealed would build schools, and would offer to the school boards teachers whose qualifications to teach the secular branches desired could be passed upon by the State. Continuing, the speaker undertook to demonstrate that religious teaching is essential to the success of our educational system. He quoted from Herbert Spencer to show that a system of education that excludes a code of ethics based on the supernatural cannot rise higher than the merely natural, and that such an ethical system cannot give a religious sanction to an oath such as Washington claimed our property, our reputation and our lives depend upon for their security. According to Washington, whatever may be conceded to the influence of refined education we cannot expect national morality to prevail in the exclusion of religious principles. In other words, Archbishop Montgomery told the people at Berkeley that the system of education in vogue in our State University is imperfect, and that the students cannot hope to become good citizens unless some attention is paid to their religious training.

The Value of Insincerity

It was said of a man who was nominated for office in this city last week that he would be a strong candidate because of his popularity, which was due, among other things, to his sincerity. The statement was in the nature of a paradoxical panegyric. Sincerity breeds unpopularity. The sincere man is never a successful politician. The popular man is invariably an affable fellow who is always on guard and careful to avoid doing or saying anything which may be likely to engender ill feeling. He is not sincere. He spends half his time wriggling out of embarrassing situations even when friendship should dictate that he take a positive stand. He is on both sides of every controversy, and he always has important business on hand whenever his friend who is involved in a contest in a lodge or a club needs his vote. The man who has the sincerity to express his opinions, to be frank, to take sides, is a man with the courage to make enemies, and though he may have many warm friends he is never popular in the sense in which that much-misunderstood term is used nowadays. But every cautious popularity-seeker who avoids making enemies is not a successful exponent of the gentle art of winning widespread esteem. Some there are whose work, to borrow from the vernacular, is too coarse. The affected gladness of the glad-hand is sometimes transparent. Nevertheless, insincerity is one of the rudiments of the politician. He must exhibit a seeming frankness with a real reserve. He may have the dexterity to conceal the truth without telling a lie, but he does not scruple at prevarication. He is ever ready to embrace the man he hates when it would be inexpedient to knock him down. He is like the prudent cuckold, who, according to Lord Chesterfield, pockets his horns when he cannot gore with them. He is ever careful to conceal resentment that cannot be gratified. What his breast forges that his tongue does not vent. He has a graceful way of flattering people behind their backs in the presence of those who, for their own benefit, will not fail to repeat, and even amplify the praise, to the party concerned. He is skilled in the cunning which Lord Bacon calls left-handed wisdom. In other words, the popular man, who is almost invariably a politician, because the greed for popularity is usually instilled by the desire to hold office, is a dissembler. When a man starts out to become popular, and you see him laboring to that end, you may be pretty certain that he is preparing to take the hurdles in the chase for office. And not only would he flatter Neptune for his trident, but even a bootblack for his vote.

It's Talk That Causes Trouble

President Roosevelt is, perhaps, the most talkative president we ever had. Loquacity is a dangerous thing, especially when everything one says is taken down by a stenographer, but while much that the President has said has been misconstrued, and though his remarks have provoked much harsh criticism, he manifests no inclination to sequester his tongue in his cheek. The latest of his utterances to incite his critics to pen-brandishing were those made at Antietam, and, singularly enough, it was not what he said so much as what he didn't say that gave them cause for demurrer. Not once in his speech did he mention General McClellan, who was in command during the battle. It happens that the son and namesake of the General is an aspirant for the Democratic nomination for Mayor of New York, and his friends regarded the omission as intentional. However, there may have been another reason. It has long been maintained that McClellan used very bad judgment at Antietam, and some went so far years ago to charge that he was lacking in patriotism. It is true that he was retired after the battle which ended his fighting career, but his friends have always claimed that as the victory was overwhelming it was all that could have been accomplished. Perhaps President Roosevelt did not care to revive a controversy that had so long slumbered. But the controversy has been revived, and, though President Roosevelt was anxious to keep out of the Mayoralty contest in Gotham, he has been dragged into it, and all because of what he didn't say while saying many things at Antietam.

Vulgar Curiosity

On the strength of Mrs. Poultney Bigelow's recent divorce, critics are professing to feel some delicacy in dealing with her recent novel, since it is based on the trials of an infelicitous marriage, and there is a possibility that she may have used her own experience as literary material. When it comes to that, if writers have no objection to opening all their doors and windows to the public, it is far-fetched squeamishness which would prevent all the world from entering in and taking note. However, this professional squeamishness is not a bad thing in its way, since it may mark the beginning of a reaction. For a good many years the propriety of restraining curiosity in such matters has been the last thing to suggest itself to either writer or reader. The most intimate correspondence and the most confidential communications have been placed before the public as a matter of course, and with scarcely the hint of an apology. It was taken for granted that every one wanted to know everything, and since the revelations could be made to pay, there was no more to be said. Since Froude's publication of the Carlyle correspondence and diaries there has been a continuous competition to outdo them in revelations, and wives and daughters, husbands and sons, intimate friends and chance acquaintances have vied with one another in the unholy traffic. For every boom novel there has been a comet's tail of other books, magazine articles and supplemental stories professing to identify the characters with real people, living or dead, and one of the most popular books of the last two years owed its vogue to the clever intimation that it was one side of an intimate correspondence. No one knew, pretended to know, or cared to know who the writer was. It was enough that the letters of which the volume was composed were believed to be genuine and meant for but a single pair of eyes. What difference there can be between the morality of reading private correspondence in print and opening another's letters, or in perusing an account of an intimate and confidential conversation and applying an ear to a convenient keyhole is a matter that needs some elucidation, but it marks an improvement in public morals when professional book tasters claim to be delicate about where they tread lest they should be inadvertently crushing corns.

The Preposterous Yankee

"The Unspeakable Scot," which drew popular attention to Mr. Crossland, was promptly followed by "The Egregious English," so there is nothing surprising in finding another of the same style of book added under the title "The Preposterous Yankee." This purports to be the work of Montague Vernon Ponsonby, Esq., but it has been hinted that in all likelihood, when the veil is torn aside, we shall find Arthur McEwen concealing himself. Be this as it may, the book is after the fashion of Dickens' "American Notes," and the American part of "Martin Chuzzlewit," and though it is brought out in London for the edification of our British cousins, it is too absurd to be considered seriously. We are too well used to poking fun at ourselves to find anything new in it, and as to the manner, it is reminiscent of a cow trying to frisk like a lamb. "Thousands of New Yorkers," says Montague Vernon Ponsonby, Esq., "live in residential hotels. These remind the Englishman strangely of London workhouses, whose inmates are fed on the fodder trough principle, and who are dictated to by beadles and other officious creatures." "Few big social functions take place in American high life without at least one fist fight, though, to do the men justice, it must be admitted that they rarely punch each other while they remain sober. But of course there is plenty of time for personal encounters at balls and dinners in Fifth Avenue." "A leader of the 'Four Hundred'—that's what society calls itself, because, as it boasts, there are at least 400 persons who don't put their knives in their mouths—this leader cut a gentleman off her visiting list because he slapped men's faces at her parties. She was accused of 'aping European exclusiveness,' and was quite unpopular for awhile." Which goes to show that Montague Victor really knows what he is talking about. Apparently he did not manage to extend his operations to San Francisco, else he would not have failed to chronicle the poetical pastime of crowning one's own immortal brow with lettuce leaves, or appearing in any style of garment that happened to be at hand. The commuter comes in for it, too, and he is represented as converting himself into a pack animal and arriving at his domicile weighted down with sacks of flour, "haunches" of pork, "bushels" of coal and "hundredweights" of firewood, not to mention bricks by the pound. As this veracious chronicler professes to note only what he has seen himself, it must have been a special Providence which protected our suburbanites from being detected carrying quarts of eggs and dozens of milk. Montague Vernon exhausted his list of epithets when he discovered Chicago, which, according to his description, "is a blank, dreary city; flat, stale, unprofitable, gawky, dry and dusty, dirty and wholly preposterous, located on the western shore of a large pool of dirty water known as Lake Michigan." He further states that it is the only city in which he ever "felt afraid for his life in broad daylight on a principal thoroughfare." After that broadside, it is not likely that he will ever again venture his precious life within the confines of the Windy City. If this were the first book of the kind ever written about America and Americans it might call forth indignant criticism. As it is, these eels are used to skinning. If it should turn out that this is an attempt of some ten-days tourist to make a book from his "experiences," he is welcome to all the pleasure and profit there is in it. If, as is quite as likely, it is some native satirist trying to see through foreign spectacles, why, then it is a family joke, and we can afford to laugh at it.

To Discourage the Smasher

The conclusion has been reached that baggage-smashing must be discouraged. That highly autocratic individual known as the baggage-smasher is to be subjected to a restraining influence. How it is to be exercised nobody has the faintest notion, but the question is to be taken up for discussion by the Association of General Passenger Agents at a meeting to be held this month. The gentlemen of that association have some vague idea about inducing concerted action on the part of the railroads, with a view of compelling moderation in the methods of those brawny fellows who appear to be engaged in the baggage-handling business merely for the pleasure they derive from wrecking the impedimenta of travelers. The deliberations of the passenger agents will be watched with considerable interest by everybody who has traveled some distance on a railroad. If they succeed in solving the problem they will be entitled to the gratitude of millions of people. But the baggage-smasher is not to be easily deprived of what he has long considered his inalienable rights. He does not wreck baggage merely for the lust of achieving the mutilation of other people's property. He conceives it to be his duty to demonstrate the superiority of muscle over mere bulk, and to execute those little tricks by which the heaviest trunks are made to appear as light as thistle down. He feels that there is science in his trade, and it gives him as much pleasure in wrestling with a trunk successfully and proving its susceptibility to damage as a prize-fighter derives from putting the quietus on an opponent. The greater the bulk of the trunk and the more fortified it is against assault, the keener is the ecstacy of the baggage-smasher who brings tears to the eyes of the owner. When he reaches for a small, humble trunk he has an expression of contempt on his face, and he doesn't deign to look in the direction in which he tosses it. He has been suspected of an alliance with trunk manufacturers, but the suspicion is a libelous reflection on the smasher. It may be possible to teach him the virtue of moderation, but we are inclined to believe that he is wedded to violence and that he cannot be divorced.

The Result of Bigotry

The fight against Mormon Smoot is on once more. Those energetic agitators of the W. C. T. U. are hot on his trail. They are circulating protests against his admission to the charmed circle of statesmen at Washington, and they are securing many signatures, for there are many people who fear that if Smoot is not repudiated some dire calamity will descend upon the country. So we are favored once more with the edifying spectacle of a crusade by monogamic Christians against a Christian who is believed to be polygamic at heart. Ostensibly it is Smoot's polygamous tendencies that have incited the agitation, but it is really stimulated by a prejudice against Mormonism. It is the old spirit of bigotry and intolerance that inspires the members of the W. C. T. U. After all the lessons of history, is it not pitiable that we are still in the era of persecution, of wholly needless suffering for conscience's sake? Mormonism would spread with less rapidity if it were not under the ban. Mormons do not show less devotion to their cause than other zealots. There is no religious extravagance for which men will not go to prison or to death, and even invite persecution if the passionate recalcitrancy of human nature can be aroused. There is absolutely nothing so dear to a man as having his own way in his own affairs.

The Municipal Campaign

Up to this time (Wednesday) Franklin K. Lane has not disclosed his intentions regarding the municipal campaign, but his friends never had any doubt on the subject. It is evident they felt he was not sincere when he announced that he would not run for Mayor unless the Democracy were united, for before there was even a prospect of a compromise in the convention they were booming him as the standard-bearer of the party. The campaign promises to be an exceedingly lively one. At this early day it would be absurd to indulge in prognostications, for the campaign has hardly begun, and public sentiment is variable between the adjournment of the conventions and election day. Eugene Schmitz was the first Mayoralty candidate in the field, and he has been very active from the start. As he has a strong following among the labor unions and as there is a disgruntled element in both the Democratic and Republican parties, it is quite natural that it should appear that he was in the lead. But reaction is almost inevitable in every political campaign, and the candidate who spends his energy in the beginning is usually a cripple in the stretch. Schmitz will find the running a little heavier this year than it was two years ago. Public sentiment is not so strong on the side of the labor unions as it was in the last campaign. Moreover people are reluctant to invest Schmitz, and his side partner, Abe Ruef, with absolute control of all commissions. Conservative people are disgusted with the political agitators and mercenary knaves who have been casting odium on labor unionism, and the probability is that they will unite behind the Republican candidate. Lane has proved himself a demagogue, and in the gubernatorial campaign his negotiations were all with the labor leaders. He never grew tired reiterating his fealty to organized labor. He was asked by his friends to protest against the insults heaped upon his opponent by the men at the Union Iron Works, and to demand fair play for an American citizen, but he declined to do so. It is not likely that he will receive the support of people who have been condemning the practices of the professional industrial disturbers of this city.

Hints and Half Lights

BY HARRY COWELL

The garish day I have never loved; it reveals too much to the sight, leaves too little to the imagination. Cheaply hypercritical it is, cruelly laying bare the manifold imperfections of Nature. In its false philosophy, which it advocates with no lack of noise, the universe is all outside. To the eyes of the soul its glare is intolerable; it prevents the sense that lies back of the senses from seeing the beauty that lies back of beauty. Let sticklers for the verities stand shadowless in the full gaze of the sun; as for me, I love the half-lights. In my opinion, moreover, the dusk of evening —equivocal as it is—comes nearer to telling the whole truth in this matter of life here below than does the plain-spoken day. I listen to its low voice and watch the external world fade into the unreality, or partial reality, that it in fact is. My mind no longer stops at the surface of things. One by one the wonders of the internal world become visible in the gloaming. Shy wild thoughts that all day long have lain under cover come out into the open.

Midnight, especially when its mystery is made even more mysterious by the moon, has for me a fascination such as never had midday. The obvious is without the least attraction. The unattainable, like a better sort of will-o'-the-wisp, lures me, incessantly lures me. Many a time have I bogged me because of it. I dream of unfathomable women, daughters of midnight and the moon, more unfathomable after marriage than before; I dream of an infinite regressus of delight. The people I like to know are those I know I can never know, even should they house with me for half a century. Philosophers who would fain do all my thinking for me, priests who would fain keep my conscience, I cannot abide. I hate that facile fiction wherein, instead of being forced by stress of circumstances to show what manner of men and women they are, all the characters are described with insulting minuteness. Is there any blacker beast alive than the long-eared biped that explains a joke? Indirection is a thing of beauty and a joy forever. I have learned that a hint from art is often more luminous than a definition from science. The face of Leonardo da Vinci's "Mona Lisa," who has been "a diver into deep seas, and keeps their fallen day about her," charms me more than all the palpable Virgins ever painted.

Love is the most ravishing of all the emotions; and we cannot in the least say what it is or why it is. Music, the vaguest of the arts, is the most suggestive; it says nothing directly, it is all inferences; yet an hour with Beethoven has often taught me more of the "Wisdom of Life" than a day with Schopenhauer.

The riddle of the universe is as interesting as it is unanswerable. For ages it has kept philosopher and fool alike guessing, and will keep for ages to come. It is asked in the half-light and answered in the dark; that is to say, there is no answer or ten thousand. Who would have it otherwise? Not the artist, not the lover of beauty, not the lover of love. Every woman knows the value of a veil. God made Eve naked; the Devil, knowing that man had imagination, invented dress.

Facts are nothing; inferences from facts everything. It is what is inferred from a face that makes it ugly or beautiful. A man kisses a woman in a game of forfeits, before a lot of people. In like manner has she kissed his neighbor to the left. It may mean no more than this, that she is loath to make a fuss. Afterward the same woman kisses the same man, but now they are alone. She is no flirt; she is sincere, fastidious. From her action he may reasonably conclude that she loves him. How much this kiss means it would be impossible to say. A thousand legitimate collateral inferences might be made, varying according to the character of the woman, each one of which has its significance, and should have its effect upon the feelings of the man.

French fiction is superior to English, not so much because the phrase is more felicitous, the form more perfect, but because it concerns itself more with inferences than with facts, or, rather, with facts more for the sake of the inferences than for the facts' sake. To read Flaubert aright takes an artist. Here, however, as in England, reading is a lost art; no, it is an art yet to be born.

To me the day is, for the most part, but a bald fact. The night is all suggestion. What life they miss, those drowsy ones who know night only as a time for sleep and forgetfulness and a folding of the hands in sleep; not as a time for wondrous awakenings, for the remembering of things that never happened, for the foreseeing of things that will never come to pass—things too delicate to be exposed to the rude light of the sun; evanescent things brought into momentary being by the white magic of the moon and the innocent enchantments of the stars! Who know it best love most the golden silence of the night, that makes a little less than silver the rarest speech of day. The gaudy blonde day is the darling of business men and the sorry sons of toil; but lovers and poets and philosophers in all times and lands have preferred the beauty of the brunette night.

I like to think of death as beautiful life with a veil over its face. At the thought my blood goes singing through my veins. A fine curiosity takes the place of fear; and at that moment, did Fate so will it, I could go bounding deathward with step as light as a lover's. For death as a permanent impossibility of sensation I have a marked distaste. Feeling I enjoy; there is in truth no other sort of enjoyment—or sorrow, for that matter. The certainty of death quickens consciousness; and the uncertainty of what lies beyond it is a field wherein superfluous imagination may disport itself at will. And because pale Death gives color to Life I cannot deny him his meed of praise. The very thought of him makes me bestir myself lest, perchance, he catch me before I catch my dream.

The Spreckels Family Jars

It has been said that the whirligig of time removes prejudice and passions. Perhaps it does, but not when they are as deep-rooted as those that are responsible for the stern and uncompromising attitude of Claus Spreckels toward those members of his family who had the temerity to ignore his mandates. There is something reminiscent of the harshness of parental rule that prevailed in mediæval times in the conduct of Claus Spreckels towards those members of his family who have incurred what appears to be his irreconcilable displeasure. It never occurs to the picturesque and sublimely stubborn old gentleman that in his tilts with his offspring he is encountering qualities so like his own that he must have been responsible for them. He has the courage of his convictions more strongly developed than any other man in San Francisco. He is a most tenacious enemy, but he is also a noble and self-sacrificing friend. Unfortunately his most bitter prejudices have been directed against his own children, and as a consequence the family skeleton has been frequently dangled in the light of day. And owing to the prominence and wealth of the family, and the important part it has played in the development of this city and state, its jars and eruptions have excited more public interest than is usually caused by a domestic scandal.

That Honolulu Suit

The spectacle of a family divided against itself is always a pathetic one, and when the leading members of such a family have endeared themselves to a community by repeated acts of generosity, and by many evidences of civic pride there is always an earnest hope that harmony will some day be restored. But the possibility of a reconciliation between Claus Spreckels and his repudiated children appears to be more remote every day. The latest reminder that the fires of the family discord are still burning comes in a dispatch from Honolulu concerning the suit instituted by Mrs. Thomas Watson, only daughter of Claus Spreckels, against her father for the recovery of a block of Honolulu property valued at four hundred thousand dollars. Shortly after her marriage, Mrs. Watson conveyed to her father the property which he had given to her. The supposition was that she took this action at the instigation of her husband, it having been said that he married her for her money. Later on she changed her mind and sued for its recovery on the technical ground that the deed was invalid because it did not bear her husband's signature.

A Father's Amazing Charge

Now comes the most startling of all the unpleasant features of the bitter controversy. The only way that Spreckels's attorneys can defeat the suit is to show that Mrs. Watson had no husband at the time she executed that deed. And so they allege that Mr. and Mrs. Watson are not man and wife; that Mr. Watson was never legally divorced from his first wife, and that consequently the marriage with Miss Spreckels is void. The gravity of this charge is apparent. It is one of the most remarkable ever made by a father in a court of justice. Indeed I should prefer to believe that it was made by Mr. Spreckels's attorneys without his knowledge or consent.

Theirs Was a Love Match

The marriage of Emma Spreckels and Thomas Watson was a pure love match. She was very much younger than the staid business man who won her heart, but she found in him the ideal of her dreams and gave up a fortune that she might be happy with the man of her choice. It was in the nature of an elopement, and was a great shock to Mr. Spreckels, who had frequently entertained Mr. Watson at his home as a friend, and who believed that the latter had taken an unfair advantage of his hospitality. Indeed, it was said at the time that he had intended his daughter for another, and I believe that Sam Shortridge was then regarded as a promising suitor for the hand of the heiress. The Watsons traveled about for a long time after their romantic marriage and finally settled in England, where they bought a country place.

Estrangement of Father and Sons

Not less bitter than his feelings toward his daughter are the prejudices of Claus Spreckels against his sons, Gus and Rudolph. Ten years ago C. Augustus Spreckels and H. M. Woolley brought suit against Claus, J. D. and Adolph B. Spreckels and other directors of the Hawaiian Sugar Company, charging that defendants were defrauding plaintiffs of a large sum of money. A sensational trial was expected, but before the case came into court a secret agreement of compromise was entered into. The terms were carefully withheld from the public, and would have always no doubt have remained a secret had not Rudolph Spreckels brought suit a long time later to prevent the transfer of stock given by him as collateral security for his brother Gus, from the Nevada Bank to Honolulu, in order that it might be placed in the bank's name. Judge Hebbard granted him an injunction and Delmas and Shortridge moved to set it aside. Then the agreement became public property. It showed that the old gentleman had made a complete settlement with his son. Many stories have been told regarding the cause of the estrangement of the father and his sons Gus and Rudolph. But nothing authentic has ever been learned, because the members of the family never discuss their affairs. It has been said that the wives of the sons were in a measure responsible, but probably the correct version is that it arose through a disagreement over financial matters. It is related that the sons once refused to return to their father a large sum of money he had given them, when he needed it to fight the sugar trust. And it is said that he was never very bitter against them until their attorneys questioned his honesty in one of the suits in which they were involved.

Ness avenue is a very lonesome place. It is a large family, three of the sons and one daughter being married, and several grandchildren having come into the world, but only a small section of it has the entree to the big brownstone house in Van Ness avenue. J. D. Spreckels and his brother Adolph have retained the confidence and love of their parents, and their business interests are entwined with his, but there is no cordialty between them and their brothers or the families of any of them, though I believe the cousins, who are granddaughters of Claus Spreckels, have recently bowed politely at social functions. Who can predict a small fraction of the complications destined to ensue when the estate of Claus Spreckels is ripe for administration in the probate court?

Rudolph's Country Home

By the way, I hear that Mr. and Mrs. Rudolph Spreckels, whom many people consider the handsomest couple in San Francisco, contemplate entertaining on a lavish scale next season at their country place, which is one of the most beautiful in California. Among the features of the place now being prepared are a race-track and a polo field. They expect to have many of the summer sports at their home, and if so, they will be very much sought after.

The J. D's Old Home

I hear that the J. D. Spreckels's old home at Howard and Twenty-first streets is for sale. As it is an enormous house on a corner lot two hundred and forty-five by one hundred and twenty-seven feet, with a big garden and stable, it's hard to say when it will find a purchaser. It would take a millionaire to keep it up, and millionaires aren't moving to the Mission nowadays. Probably it may be converted into a family boarding house, or torn down, and flats erected in its stead.

Mrs. "Willie" Hearst

On the occasion of the dedication of the Hearst Greek amphitheatre in Berkeley, the other day, there was a deal of rubbering in the direction of Mrs. Willie Hearst. She more than divided interest with the stage. People were not only curious to see the young woman who had lured one of the greatest catches in America from bachelordom, but they were also eager to note her style, which is, by the way, decidedly New Yorkey. She wore a gown of some thin, light material ornamented with yellow velvet bows. Her hat was of bright escholtzias, and her carriage coat of bright green. If it weren't for that green coat people might have thought that the costume was emblematic of the style of journalism which young Mr. Hearst has made famous. Altogether, she was quite a Scotch-plaid combination of primal colors. It was a garish costume, but she presented a pleasing personality. She is quite pretty, with round, childish cheeks, wide-open eyes, fine teeth and pretty brown hair, which she wears quite simply. When she was on the stage she wore her hair in an enormous pompadour but all that has been done away with. Orrin Peck accompanies the couple as a sort of St. John crying aloud in the wilderness. I believe he is responsible for the story that every morning Mrs. Hearst calls for the emerald her mother-in-law sent her for a wedding present, and weeps over it and kisses it. It is a good story and is not materially injured by the fact that Mrs. Hearst sent no emerald —only a telegram of congratulations. Another authority is responsible for the story that the present Mrs. Hearst is not one of the Wilson sisters who were on the stage; that she is a third sister who was never in the profession. This story is also slightly inaccurate. It happens that the parents of the Wilson sisters had only two daughters.

Her Authority Impeached

Madame La Bavarde's "unimpeachable authority" has been impeached. It will be remembered that some months ago she undertook to extenuate the action of Mrs. Van Wyck in breaking away from the Albert Sidney Johnston chapter of the Daughters of the Confederacy, and causing a split in the order by organizing the Jefferson Davis chapter. She explained, on what she alleged was unimpeachable authority, that Mrs. Van Wyck had organized the chapter at the suggestion of Mrs. Weed, wife of the Bishop of Florida. This statement aroused the indignation of the women of the Sidney Johnston chapter over which Mrs. Voorhies presides. When Mrs. Weed was President of the order, she visited this city and was entertained by the Daughters of Sidney Johnston chapter, and they were loth to believe that while affecting friendship for them and enjoying their hospitality, she should have been advocating the organization of a rival chapter.

Bishop Weed Replies

The women of Sidney Johnston chapter promptly challenged the statement of Madame La Bavarde, and she suggested that the matter should be referred to Mrs. Weed, who would of course tell the truth. The supposition was that the controversy would not be pursued, and that the question of veracity would be permitted to remain undecided. But the members of Albert Sidney Johnston chapter resolved upon getting at the truth. They believed that Mrs. Weed had been done an injustice. They had understood that Mrs. Van Wyck had consulted her, and that she advised against a rival chapter. She even suggested that if Mrs. Van Wyck was dissatisfied with the Albert Sidney Johnston chapter, she should join the chapter in Los Angeles. However Mrs. Weed was communicated with, and as she is seriously ill, her husband, Bishop Weed, penned the reply in which he said that his wife corroborated Mrs. Voorhies's version of the whole affair, and that she never suggested the organization of Jefferson Davis chapter. Now let us have the name of Madame La Bavarde's "unimpeachable authority." In lieu of that it would be interesting to know if Mrs. Van Wyck has anything to say on the subject.

Behind the Scenes

It is always interesting to peer behind the scenes when a political drama is being enacted. It is exciting to watch the shifting of the scenes and amusing to observe the comedy in the wings. Last week, when Franklin K. Lane sprung his sensational letter on the Democratic convention, there was great bustle and excitement behind the scenes. Boss McNab had hysterics and Mr. Hearst threw a conniption fit. Mr. McNab realized at once that he would have to make terms with the hated minority, the Horses and Carts, as he has been calling them in the Bulletin for months. Lane wouldn't run unless the H's and C's were appeased, and Mr. McNab knew that he had to humiliate himself. Hearst had been figuring upon making a spectacular fight for Lane to "square" himself with the people, who were sore because of the attitude of the Examiner in the gubernatorial campaign. He has no affection for Lane, but as he is a candidate for President it behooves him to atone for infidelity. If Lane didn't run he would be blamed for the division of the party and the breach wouldn't be healed. So the next day the Examiner scored the minority for its stubbornness and pleaded for harmony.

His Inflated Head

Meanwhile the editor of the Bulletin was also agitated. He had counted on Lane's being a candidate and beating the Republican nominee with the Bulletin's support. Lane is one of the representatives of the Phelan push which has always enjoyed the Bulletin's support, and besides the paper is eager to smash the Republican alliance because it includes the proprietors of the Bulletin's hated rivals, the Chronicle and Call. So the Lane letter fairly staggered all hands behind the scenes. They all dislike Lane on account of his inflated head, as McNab calls it, but they considered him an absolute necessity. However, there was no way out of the difficulty except to appease the hated minority. They cursed Lane for seeking to pedestal himself at their expense, and they denounced him for his selfishness, but they had to swallow the bitter pill.

Lane on Himself

Mr. Franklin K. Lane appeared before the Democratic convention last Wednesday night, and kindly condescended to accept the nomination for Mayor. He then took occasion to express himself in a series of personal pronouns. Here are some excerpts from that address:

"I have certainly the awakened and quickened conscience of the great body of people of this city and county."

"I am a fighter. If you want a fighter to lead you, I am with you."

"When I failed of the Governorship it was not because of my own people—those with whom I had served, those to whom I had given five years of my time, those who knew me personally and intimately, those who had looked into my eye, who knew the kind of man I was."

"Will you be with me? Then come with me. I will lead you."

It will be noticed that Mr. Lane claims among other things to be the keeper of the people's conscience.

B. Shaw's Rival

Mr. Lane is surely a unique figure in politics. His assurance is stupendous. He really believes that he is a modern Moses, divinely ordained to lead the people of San Francisco. He is not running for Mayor as a party candidate. He said in his letter that if he accepted the nomination he would be actuated by his sense of obligation to the people who needed his services. He has not yet confessed that he received a message from God, but he probably will before the campaign is over. We may yet expect him to explain the advantage of being able to write two opinions on every important public question; also, why he failed to prosecute the suit against the Southern Pacific Company for the removal of the Mission tracks, and why he considers himself peculiarly qualified to "save" the charter. It is boldness that wins, these days. Bernard Shaw proudly proclaimed himself a mountebank, and forthwith he was put upon a pedestal. Mr. Lane is undoubtedly more entitled than Shaw to the distinction.

The Crocker Feud

Now that Henry J. Crocker is running for Mayor, one hears a good deal about the efforts that will be made to defeat him by his cousin, Will Crocker of the Crocker-Woolworth bank. The feud in the Crocker family is quite bitter. The two cousins were very friendly until they became involved in some financial transactions that proved unsuccessful, and then they became deadly enemies. Henry Crocker accused his cousin Will, and the latter's brother-in-law, Prince Poniatowski, of having flim-flammed him in a railroad deal, and he brought suit for eighty-six thousand dollars, which the defendants were very glad to compromise. Since then it has been war to the hilt between them, but I doubt very much that Will Crocker will make a fight against the Republican candidate. He cannot afford to antagonize the powerful interests behind the Republican party. It is easier to stifle the prejudices of a rich man engaged in the banking business than it is to placate a hod-carrier. Threaten to deprive him of a few of the accounts on his books and he will quit in a minute.

The Crocker Family

There is a popular delusion that Henry Crocker is a very rich man, and it is probably due to the fact that he is confounded with the heirs of Charles Crocker, the railroad magnate. He is a son of Clark Crocker, a brother of millionaire Charles Crocker. Though he is not wealthy, his wife is. She was Miss Ives who inherited half the fortune of the late Charles McLaughlin. Mrs. Crocker, by the way, is the mother of six children and she shows remarkable devotion to the nursery. She studies foreign languages with her children, and also the same lessons that they are given.

The Bradburys Again

Up from the orange groves of the southland comes the news that John Bradbury is to wed Miss Bessie Tonner, a pretty typist, and that Lucy Banning Bradbury, she of the pyrotechnic past, is engaged to marry a real estate agent of Los Angeles. Lucy and John have not been divorced very long. Indeed they have not exhibited that fashionable haste which characterizes the shifting of marital relations in Newport. But ever since that Ward affair Lucy has become more deliberate in her actions. She learned from that experience that she was unable to gauge the depth and durability of her own affections. She thought that her husband bored her, and that Ward was an ideal lover. So she ran away with Ward, but when they were intercepted, and her paramour was arrested for adultery, she discovered that her passion was of the evanescent variety. Young Bradbury was quick to forgive his flirty wife for her piquant transgression, and from the arms of her repudiated lover she returned to her faithful husband, and they rejoiced in their reunion. I believe they enjoyed a second treacle-moon trip, while the poor wretch of an Englishman, who had been hugging a delusion, committed suicide. The romance had a tragic denouement for him, but the Bradburys lived happily for several years, and then the tired feeling became mutual. So they were divorced, and now they are to make a new deal, a new set of affections having been awakened. Far away in England live the widow and children of the unfortunate fellow to whom punishment came so swiftly for the stolen delights of a few hours.

Adieu to the Deans

Mr. and Mrs. Walter Dean and Miss Helen Dean will soon leave San Francisco for an extended trip abroad. Mrs. Dean has long been unable to travel on account of ill health. She usually collapses after any unwonted exercise. Miss Dean will leave behind a long string of sighing swains. She expects to have a good time in New York with her bosom friend, Lurline Spreckels, and at the close of the winter season there she will go to Europe with her parents. There will be a large colony of Californians in New York this winter. Californians usually flock together in the metropolis. Those that are in the charmed circle help those on the outside through the portals. I hear that it was Mrs. Moore Robinson, nee Ivers, who sponsored Miss Emily Taylor during the Newport season.

San Franciscans Abroad

Never before was there a winter when so many prominent San Franciscans were traveling abroad. As many of the absent women are indispensable as hostesses the winter promises to be a little dull. Mrs. W. H. Crocker, Mrs. Downey Harvey and Miss McKinstry, all great friends, are abroad and are likely to remain there all winter. Miss McKinstry is at present at Carlsbad where she has lost some twenty pounds in weight, which must, of course, improve her appearance vastly. Mrs. John F. Swift is another San Franciscan in Carlsbad who is taking the waters and enjoying a much needed rest. She went to Europe for medical advice but finds that there is nothing the matter with her except fatigue—she had been too active in the various public matters in which she takes so lively an interest.

Reluctant to Lose Daughter

It is said that there is nothing in the world the matter with Mrs. Robert Bruce except unwillingness to lose her daughter, Bertie. Mrs. Bruce made no such fuss when her daughter Janet was married, but when the younger daughter's engagement was announced Mrs. Bruce promptly had a fit of nerves. The wedding day was postponed out of deference to her wishes and now the postponed day has passed. The groom-to-be is sulking in the country and the bride-elect is most unhappy. At every mention of the wedding Mrs. Bruce has hysterics.

Mr. Farnsworth, the San Rafael artist who paints hunt scenes very well, but who failed to sell them for years, has won recognition and his art is now remunerative. He is selling his pictures to the Burlingame clique. Giuseppi Cadenasso is another artist upon whom fortune has been smiling lately. Mamma Has Forgiven

I hear that Sanger Pullman has turned over such a fresh new leaf that his mother has not only taken him back into her good graces but has included his wife, Miss West of San Francisco that was, in her favor. Sanger and his wife have grown so stout that their Burlingame friends would scarcely recognize them.

A Grass Widow to Wed

My Honolulu correspondent sends me some social gossip of interest to people in this city, as well as to residents of the islands. He reports among other things that Mrs. S. B. Travis is to marry Lieutenant Harry Newton of the Artillery on the twentieth. Newton was a captain of the volunteer service from Wisconsin. He was one of the men who accompanied Funston on the trip that resulted in the capture of Aguinaldo. He is now in the regular service. Mrs. Travis is a divorcee. She arrived in the islands about six years ago, with her aunt, and after a short stay they went to Japan with Helen Wilder, and spent a very jolly summer in the Orient. On her return to the islands she met Joseph S. Travis, a newspaper man who was well known in this city and Oakland. They were married against the wishes of the aunt, who never spoke to them afterwards, and who also closed her purse, which was a generous one and well filled, too. A little later the young married people came to this city where Travis played a series of engagements in newspaperdom. Then they separated, Travis going to the Philippines and Mrs. Travis remaining here long enough to obtain a divorce, after which she went back to Honolulu with several trunks filled with expensive gowns and much stunning millinery. She will make a very stunning army woman.

The Latest Afong Marriage

Captain Whiting, who is in this city now, has a new brother-in-law about whom I have received a little information from my Honolulu correspondent. James W. W. Brewster is the man, he having married another of the Afong girls, one of whom married Captain Whiting. Another is the wife of Lieutenant Dougherty, of the Twenty-eighth Infantry, who will soon come to the Presidio, and still another is the wife of Judge Humphrey of Honolulu. Mrs. Brewster is the youngest of the Afong girls. Brewster did not make much of a hit in Honolulu, though it was known that he was the grandson of the Brewster who used to make the only carriages that were considered proper by the smart set of New York some years ago. He had some money when he arrived in the islands and talked of embarking in business there, but he never succeeded in closing any of the numerous deals that he started. The day before his marriage, his uncle, Francis C. Brewster, sued him for five thousand dollars for defamation of character. It appears that he had told several people that his uncle had stolen fifty dollars from his clothes while they were hanging in their common apartment at the Clifton. The suit was compromised before the nephew left for the Orient with his bride.

Dougherty and His Bride

The wedding of Miss Sara Robertson and James Dougherty took place in Honolulu last week. The latter is the son of Mrs. Joseph Spear Jr., of this city. He first arrived in the islands a few years ago as a cadet on one of the Oceanic steamships. He was fitted out with uniforms and nautical instruments and he was studying navigation, but he grew tired polishing the brass hand-rails on the upper deck, and when he reached Honolulu he took French leave. He is now a clerk in a big jewelry house. Miss Robertson is the daughter of George H. Robertson, manager for G. Brewer & Co. She has just enough Hawaiian blood in her to give her a fetching olive complexion.

John Vance No Longer Cold

When Mrs. Abbey Cheney, the apostle of the New Thought, sought divorce from John Vance Cheney, librarian of the Newberry library in Chicago, she referred, in her complaint, to the "austere coldness" of defendant. It was that icy chill that was one of the reasons Mrs. Cheney gave for desiring to be free from the poet-librarian. Shortly after the divorce was granted Mr. Cheney re-married, his bride being a school teacher from New England. And since then he has published some poems breathing passion of Kilauea-like intensity, anything but austerely cold. Possibly the "austere coldness" Mrs. Cheney, the first, bewailed was due to herself, and not to the lack of an erotic quality in the temperament of her husband.

The Fernalds Have Gone East

The "Charlie" Fernalds, writes my Santa Barbara correspondent, left quite suddenly for the East, called thence by the death of "Nat" Swift. Mrs. Fernald, who was Bessie Swift of Chicago, was married only a few months ago, and came to her husband's Californian home almost directly after her marriage. "Nat" Swift's death was caused by an accident on the polo field, a fatal ball driven by Sidney Love being the cause. Young Swift was near-sighted and did not see the ball in time. He had everything to live for, being young, rich and healthy, and polo was his principal pleasure. Polo, by the way, is not more dangerous than other sports, but one has to be exceedingly agile to keep out of the way of the mallets and balls, and to guard against falls from ponies.

Inviting People You Don't Know

The custom of inviting people whom you don't know to your functions, hoping that the lavishness of the promised entertainment will attract them and thus permit you to include the well-known name in the list of "among those invited," is growing alarmingly in San Francisco. Season before last I had occasion to comment on a large luncheon given at the University Club to which the hostess invited many women with whom she had only a bowing acquaintance and with some not so much as that, even. The surprise among these matrons was great and undisguised and some of them went about openly saying, "Who is Mrs. ——, and why does she invite me to her luncheon?" The same thing was done the other day at an entertainment in honor of a sojourning celebrity. The hostess called up by telephone a well-known girl and as the young woman was in bed was forced to give the message to her maid. The maid returned with the curt reply, "Miss —— says that she does not know Mrs. ——." The would-be hostess hung up the 'phone with a click, but the list of guests contained the young lady's name just the same.

The Spook Family of San Jose

Mrs. Mary Hayes-Chynoweth has had nothing more to say about the San Jose Women's Club or the iniquitous pow-wow, but the troubled waters have not yet subsided. Indignation is still aflame in the breasts of the women of San Jose, and though they do not expect an apology, neither do they intend to submit to any more insults from the arrogant spook prophetess. Mrs. Chynoweth, by the way, preaches every Sunday evening in the Unitarian church, but the Unitarians are very anxious to have it known that she has no connection with their society. She merely rents the church building. Some years ago she built a handsome chapel at her home in Edendale, nine miles from San Jose, but it was destroyed by fire a few months ago. This was the second conflagration from which the Hayes-Chynoweth family suffered. A few years ago a fire destroyed their beautiful home at Edendale. It contained over one hundred rooms and was magnificently furnished. The house and the furniture are said to have cost a quarter of a million dollars. After the second fire people in San Jose suggested that Mrs. Chynoweth had been holding communication with spirits from tropical regions.

The Spirits Sanction "Booze"

Mrs. Chynoweth is an ardent prohibitionist, and she has frequently said that all the members of her family were exponents of total abstinence in liquor and tobacco. But when her son, J. O. Hayes, was in Sacramento seeking the Republican nomination for Governor, he opened headquarters in which he dispensed liquor and cigars in liberal quantities and great variety. It is said that the hospitality of the job-chaser cost the family from five hundred to one thousand dollars a day. But in that matter, as in all others, he was no doubt guided by spirit influence. The spooks are ever ready to accommodate themselves to circumstances. Mrs. Chynoweth has explained that it has happened that one of her sons has been ordered by the head spook to shake hands with a certain politician whom it is desired to bring into rapport with her "familiar." By this handshaking process the connection is made and Mrs. Chynoweth does the rest. And these are the people who are engaged in moulding public sentiment in the beautiful Santa Clara valley, through the medium of two newspapers and a barrel of money that is always on tap.

"After you, my dear Gaston," said the undertaker to the physician who was just taking leave of a patient.

And then the sick man knew that it was all off.

Keep Your Eye on the Cook

The annoyance due to the scarcity in the supply of good servants these days is greater than ever before in the history of this city. The white girl kitchen mechanic has become higher-priced and more independent, good Chinese cooks are beyond the reach of all who are not in affluent circumstances, and the Jap who is just learning has become an intolerable nuisance because he never hesitates to misrepresent his qualifications, and you generally have to try a dozen before you find one who knows his business. So scarce is the supply of competent help that people are beginning to lure away good servants from homes in which they are content by offers of higher wages. Hence if you have a good cook, keep an eye on the butcher boy and the vegetable man, for they may be acting as the emissary of some woman who has offered a premium for a cuisine artist. There is a woman in Van Ness avenue who secures all her servants in that way, and the other day she was caught, and she received a very severe tongue lashing over the 'phone from the woman on whose cook she had designs. These be days of brisk competition in domestic affairs.

The Fascinating Mrs. Morton

Mrs. Bowditch Morton has returned from the East and is staying at one of the smaller down-town hotels. She is as handsome and radiant as ever. Since her return she has been entertained in a quiet way by friends at Menlo. A year ago I stated that the Bowditch Mortons had separated, and now I learn that they have been divorced. I have been told that Mrs. Morton obtained a divorce in the East on some purely technical ground. It was uncontested. Dr. Morton, who is an invalid, is still the house physician at Del Monte. The domestic infelicities of the Mortons have been the subject of much comment. The doctor has the sympathy of women and his handsome wife has the sympathy of the chivalrous sex. Mrs. Morton was born and educated in this city, and she never went into society until she married Dr. Morton in the East. He is related to the famous Bowditch family of New York, and his father was a Harvard professor who discovered ether. He always enjoyed an excellent social position but he had no money to keep it up. However his wife inherited considerable money. Owing to his ill health, the doctor was unable to live in New York, and he spent most of his time as house physician at one resort and then at another. Mrs. Morton scored social triumphs wherever they went, and when they came to this coast her charm and beauty, her skill at golf and her equestrianship attracted attention to her from the first. Mrs. Frank Carolan "took her up" and they made a trip East together, a circumstance that fixed her status in the Four Hundred. It is said that there never was a man, woman or child who could escape the spell of Mrs. Morton's fascinations, and so I should not be surprised if a second matrimonial venture were the sequel of the divorce.

The Papyrus Club, which started out to encourage raconteuses, has become a regulation woman's club. Story-telling is no longer the only feature of the meetings, a regulation program taking up the greater part of them. At the meeting on Thursday of last week, after the members had contributed a short shrift of "wit and humor," Madame de Seminario sang, John McNaught gave a talk on women's clubs, Miss Helen Kelleher gave readings, and Homer Henley sang.

Critics Caught Napping

The utter worthlessness of musical criticism in this city was never so strikingly demonstrated as it was last week, when the critics enthused over the Scheel concert, which was so bad that the distinguished leader decided not to conduct another until his musicians had had sufficient rehearsal. It was an awful expose of the shallowness of the pretensions of those who affect a superior knowledge of music and undertake to enlighten the public about matters of which they are grossly ignorant. My associate, the critic of Town Talk, was the only one in San Francisco who told the truth about that concert. He concluded his remarks about the concert by saying that he would like to have Mr. Scheel's private opinion of the performance. That Mr. Scheel had a very poor opinion of it is evident from the fact that the performance this week was postponed, and that Mr. Shafter Howard explained that owing to other engagements the musicians did not give sufficient time to rehearsals.

In Clyde Fitch's "Stubbornness of Geraldine" everyone in the audience thought that the author was overdoing his scene when twenty-three of the heroine's trunks were brought on the stage. But Katherine Dillon's bags counted to that number and there are said to be more to follow.

A Wandering Manuscript

A recent speech of Captain Fletcher of the Art Institute had as numerous and ludicrous wanderings as Stevenson's story of "The Wrong Box." The speech was on "The City Beautiful" and was to have been delivered as one of a symposium. Captain Fletcher, who is always most courteous to the newspaper folk, had several copies of it prepared, one of which he sent to a newspaper by messenger as that particular paper had no reporter at the meeting. It so happened that Captain Fletcher had been reserved for the end of the program, but the evening's entertainment proved so long that his stunt was omitted. He telephoned in haste to the newspaper not to print the speech as it had not been delivered. He was told that the paper could not print what it had not received. This reply was explained next day when Captain Fletcher received a bill from the messenger office. It seemed that, in a burst of economy, he had sent the manuscript "C. O. D.," and the newspaper had refused to pay for it. Captain Fletcher paid the bill and regained the manuscript, to receive an almost immediate request for it from one of the commercial papers published in the city. He graciously sent the manuscript and presently received proofs which he read and corrected. The next day he seized the paper with joy to look for his speech, but it was not there. The editor wrote an apologetic note, saying that it had been crowded out, and coupled the explanation with a request that he be permitted to publish it in the following issue. This Captain Fletcher refused, saying that he had decided to deliver it. He did so last week at a mass meeting.

The Sam Buckbees were at Byron Springs last week, also Colonel Maddox, George Jackson, George Goodman, Mrs. Henry Wetherbee, the Frosts of Sausalito, Mrs. E. L. Miller and many others.

"Don't kill the fatted calf for me," wrote the Prodigal Son to his father, "as I may take the longest route home and I prefer my meat fresh."

Mrs. Robert B. Cunningham left this week for Fort Flagler, where she will visit her daughter, Mrs. Percy Kessler.

That Snow-Goldman Episode

The Oakland commuters have been rolling a highly spiced tidbit of gossip on their pliant tongues ever since the street battle between ex-Mayor Snow and his erstwhile intimate friend, Mr. Goldman. The average Oaklander dearly loves to hear about somebody's eccentricities, especially if they are such as should not be discussed except behind a screen, and that Snow-Goldman episode has superinduced the titillation of many an eager ear.

A Typical Californian Millionaire

The Joe Grants are going East to enjoy a little of the winter gayety in New York. Joe Grant is one of our young millionaires who believes in the quiet life. He never does any splurging or anything that costs money, though he has lots of it. Consequently his acquaintances suspect him of being exceedingly economical. But popular surmise is not always correct. The fact is that very few of our young millionaires know anything about the Joy of Living. They are satisfied with the commonplace pleasures of the world. Mrs. Joe Grant is a lover of music, and she hopes to enjoy the performances of the Metropolitan opera company.

To Lure Peter Home

Just before Mrs. Eleanor Martin left for the East she confided in some of her friends, to the effect that she expected the Peter Martins to accompany her on her return to this city. Peter has been promising for a long time to come out with his wife and exhibit her to the provincial aristocracy of Burlingame, but he has found it hard to tear himself away from Newport. He has lately been hobnobbing with the Duke of Roxburghe, and of course he will be in New York when the Duke's marriage takes place. The privilege of being a guest at the wedding of one of the British nobility is not to be enjoyed more than once in a lifetime.

It Is Still the Golden State

Very little is heard nowadays of the gold mines of California. Many people right here in San Francisco are of the opinion that the Klondike is the gold centre of the universe, and that the only thing worth penetrating the soil of California for is oil. The fact is that the gold mines of California are yielding great quantities of the yellow metal and that some of the richest of them are seldom heard of. I heard William C. Ralston, a mining expert of vast experience, discoursing on this subject a few days ago. He said, among other things: "When a miner drops into town from the Klondike with a sack containing about ten thousand dollars' worth of gold the dailies devote half a column of space to his arrival. They appear to be unaware of the fact that the Mint handles a million and a half dollars' worth of gold from California's mines every month."

The Richest Mine

The richest mine in California to-day is the North Star of Grass Valley, which is paying about one hundred thousand dollars in dividends every month. Yet it is scarcely ever heard of in this city. The reason, probably, is that most of the money goes East. It is controlled by James Haig of New York, to whom it was sold by Billy Bourn and a few others some years ago. They didn't think it was worth much, so they sold it for a comparatively small sum. Some people imagine that the famous Utica mine, which yielded Hayward and Hobart a fortune, is shut down. The fact is that only one of the three shafts have been abandoned. Gold is still flowing abundantly from the other two. California still holds the record as a gold-producing State, its total yield being fourteen hundred million dollars.

Ibsen and Maeterlinck for Society Amateurs

Society amateurs have gone a step ahead of the Howells farce, that years ago was so popular. Mrs. Mark Gerstle, Miss Margaret Bender, and Dr. Shiels are, I hear, to study Ibsen, Sudermann, Maeterlinck and possibly Bernard Shaw roles with a view to acting in the plays of those authors this winter. Mrs. Gerstle appeared in "The Euchre Prize," Mrs. Gerberding's playlet, last season, and those who saw her then told her she should attempt something more ambitious. So she's going to try. Ibsen is her particular fad, and Nora in "The Doll's House" will likely be her first attempt with "Hedda Gabler" later. One of Mrs. Wallace Irwin's little comedies will be given by the Spinners Club, with Grace Llewellyn Jones in a star role. Mrs. W. P. Buckingham will be seen as Portia in "The Merchant of Venice" some time in the early spring, and Mrs. De Young is contemplating appearing as Olivia in "Twelfth Night."

The Tennants of San Jose

When "Bob" Edeson comes to the Columbia next month in "Soldiers of Fortune" he will have in his company Miss Dorothy Tennant. San Jose people will be particularly interested in the coming of Miss Tennant, who hails from that city. The Tennants are one of the proudest and most exclusive families of the garden city, but they have figured in newspaper stories a deal, owing to various divorce suits. Emily, the most exclusive of them all, was divorced from her husband, Henry Spring, about four years ago. Their temperaments did not agree, Mr. Spring's tastes running to dogs and horses and his wife's to music. It was said at the time that Mrs. Spring intended going on the stage after she obtained her divorce, but I have never heard that she carried out her intention. Mary Tennant married Robert C. Gardener of San Rafael, and she also found married life unpleasant after a time. Marguerite Tennant married Otto Ziegler, the 'cyclist, and just a little while ago the Zieglers' woes were agitating the gossips.

Ziegfeld's Tempting Offer

Eastern theatrical managers are beginning to realize that Denis O'Sullivan is an ideal baritone for comic opera. The popular singer is now on his way to fresh triumphs abroad, where he has a series of concert engagements, but just before leaving this city he refused the largest salary ever paid to a male singer in comic opera in this country. Of course, that offer came from nowhere else than New York, where, when they want things, they are in the habit of getting them. But they did not get jolly Denis O'Sullivan. F. Ziegfeld Jr., who is somewhat of a plunger among managers, is going to produce at the New Lyric theatre in New York this season De Koven's new romantic opera, "The Red Feather," in which Grace Van Studdiford is to be featured as the prima donna. Mr. Ziegfeld decided to engage O'Sullivan for the leading baritone role, and he wired E. D. Price, manager of the Alcazar, to see the singer and get his best terms for a season of thirty weeks. O'Sullivan was seen and named a figure that was gaspingly prohibitive, so much so that the negotiator hesitated about even mentioning it to Ziegfeld. However, it was telegraphed to the New York manager, who at once replied offering O'Sullivan a salary that came within one hundred and fifty per week of the sum demanded, and which was larger than any salary ever paid a male singer on the comic opera stage of America. But he refused the offer and started for the East, where it is more than probable he was waylaid by Ziegfeld before he left for the other side, where he can make money enough for any man's needs.

The Antique Hostelry

There is an estrangement between the widow of Major Hooper and his nephew, due to the fact that after the Major's death, while negotiations for a renewal of the lease of that ancient and somewhat decrepit hostelry, the Occidental, were pending, the nephew made application and secured the plum. He had formerly been employed in the hotel by Major Hooper. The lease expired just before Major Hooper's death, and the widow confidently expected that she would become the lessee, but sentiment failed to cut any figure in the matter. Some years ago the Occidental was a fashionable hotel but it has become dreadfully out of date, not through any fault of the management, but owing to lack of modern equipment. It is one of the old landmarks of the city, and like the Russ House, it has seen better days. It is destined to become a purely commercial hotel.

Hotaling's Rebuke to Payne

Dr. Redmond Payne, who went north for the express purpose of killing a certain famous deer in Siskiyou county and who was successful, received shortly after a very sarcastic letter from the young millionaire, Richard Hotaling, who has such a tender heart for all dumb things that his large ranch in Marin county abounds with notices that no living thing may be killed on his place. Mr. Hotaling is clever as a letter-writer and among other things he said to Dr. Payne, whom he does not know, that he (Mr. Hotaling) would have thought that the practice of Dr. Payne's profession would give that gentleman sufficient opportunity for inflicting suffering without necessitating long trips into the country for that purpose. Dr. Payne has not as yet replied.

The Gerberdings

Mrs. Gerberding and her son, who left for Europe several months ago, are at present in Scotland. They purpose remaining abroad for some time, and Mrs. Gerberding intends doing some literary work before she returns. She spent several weeks in London and was entertained by the fashionable literary set there. Mrs. Gerberding's first husband was a cousin of Mrs. Craigie (John Oliver Hobbes) who is the literary lion of London's smart set.

Service Gossip

The constant post moves have rather dampened the ardor of those young women who formerly thought gold lace and brass buttons most attractive. Nobody knows nowadays how long he is going to be stationed at a post. Among those who have suffered by this uncertainty is Lieutenant John B. Murphy of the Artillery Corps, and his fiancee, Miss Jean Nokes, by the orders received by the former to depart for Fort Russell, Wyoming. When their wedding takes place in the spring he will have to come all the way back here for his bride instead of remaining comfortably at Angel Island, where he has been stationed for a year. Lieutenant-Colonel Louis M. Maus, who has been in charge of the medical supply depot in San Francisco, has been ordered to Fort Riley, Kansas. He is succeeded by Lieutenant-Colonel George H. Tormy. Major H. H. Ludlow, Artillery Corps, recently in command at Fort Miley, has been ordered to Missouri. The Presidio has lost two more of its officers. Major J. V. White, Artillery Corps, sailed for Manila last Thursday, where he will be on duty in the Adjutant-General's department, and Captain B. M. Koehler, also of the Artillery, has been ordered to Fort Schuyler, New York, for staff duty with Colonel A. H. Merrill. Colonel John L. Clem of the Quartermaster's department, was one of the passengers to Manila last Thursday. He will be Chief Quartermaster of the Division of the Philippines. Mr. J. M. Rittman, Auditor of the Treasury for the War Department, who has been spending his vacation on this coast, left on Sunday for the East, stopping over in Sacramento for a day or two to confer with State officials.

To Fight Sham Battles

Eleven thousand soldiers, regulars and militia, fully armed and equipped, will mobilize at Fort Riley, Kansas, on the fifteenth inst. to take part in the regular army manoeuvres conducted by the War Department. An army officer informs me that the military authorities have been preparing for the event for months. Everything possible has been done to make the game resemble war conditions, barring the wounding and killing of the combatants. The men will be taught the art of encampment; they will be drilled by brigade, corps and division; they will be spread out in lines several miles long; they will be grouped in small spaces and will be shown how to extricate themselves from seemingly dangerous positions, and there will be skirmishes and sham battles. The training is not for the enlisted men alone. There will be many young lieutenants on the battle-field, some fresh from West Point, others not long from civil life. Now that we have become a world power the officers of the War Department are looking forward to the times when the same public interest will be shown in the manoeuvres in this country as in Germany, where the victories and defeats of the opposing sides in the sham battles carry with them the applause or sympathy of the civilians. This year the manoeuvres will be participated in by a large force of militia, and the greatest good is expected to result from the bringing together in the same field of the regular and citizen soldiery. The field on which the mimic warfare is to take place consists of about forty-four thousand acres, on a tract of about seventy square miles. Major-General John C. Bates will be the master-of-ceremonies, and among other officers to participate are General Frederick D. Grant, General J. Franklin Bell, General Thomas H. Barry, General James W. F. Hughes and General C. C. Carr.

Another New Theatre

The theatrical business is rapidly expanding in San Francisco. A new theatre is in course of erection on Market street, near Ninth, and ground is to be broken for another before long, on Stockton street, opposite Union Square. This is to be a burlesque house. The property has been bonded by Harry James, late musical conductor of Fischer's who has secured the right to produce the Weberfieldian skits in the West and in Australia.

The Great I Am

Town Talk's poet was so inspired by the recent speech of Franklin K. Lane, excerpts of which are given in a preceding column, that he evolved the following:

He's off,
In a bunch
With himself
And his personal pronouns.
Who?
Why, Lane,
The great I am,
The illustrious exponent
Of Flim-Flam;
The self-confessed
Deputy
Of the Divinity.
Behold, the Pride,
And well tried,
Loyal son
Of Democracy!
On what meat doth this Caesar feed
That he hath grown so great?
Why, hot-air,
Self-administered;
Generated
By his own
Venerated Fair
Prehistoric hands.
Lo, there he stands!
Isn't he a beaut?
Just hear him toot
His own praises.
Hearken to his Ego,
Marvel at his Giant Intellect;
All of his own manufacture.
Is he a job-chaser?
Well, I guess
Yes.
As a macer,
For nominations
He's the greatest ever.
But always—he says so,
Mark you,
Pro bono Publico.
He knows his biz—
Gee whiz!
How he hates a crook.
Just take a look
Into his eyes,
At his own request, and size
Up the man.
Behold, the incarnation
Of integrity; also
Of purity,
Propriety and Sobriety.
Now, altogether,
Rah! Rah! Rah!
For the windiest
Wonder
Of the West.

Socialism Rampant

Things are coming to a pretty pass when one cannot discuss labor troubles without being called down by one's servants. At a recent large and swell luncheon in this city, two maids were passing noiselessly about the table filling the glasses while the ladies were discussing with much interest and considerable knowledge a recent big Eastern strike. Evidently the impassive faces of the maids were no indication of unreceptive minds, for they were listening to every word that was spoken. After a whispered consultation in the butler's pantry, one of the maids said softly to her mistress:

"If the conversation is not changed Marie and I shall be obliged to cease serving the tables."

The hostess went white for a moment, for she is a proud and haughty woman. Then she recovered herself, for service was indispensable, and the subject of conversation was deftly changed.

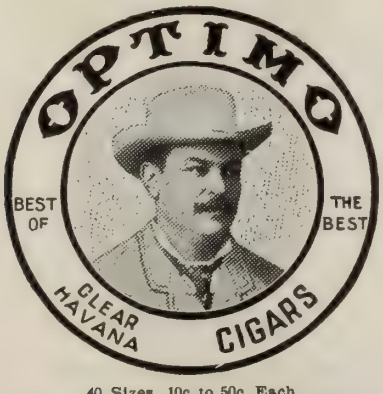
A Lady-Like Officer

When "Willie" Safford, with the truly artistic sense for which he is famed, planted his pretty quarters at Guam with rare orchids and other esthetic adornments, he little dreamed of the right of eminent domain which the bluff "Dick" Leary, Governor of the distant naval post, too early exercised by condemning and appropriating for Government use the lovely cottage that "Willie" occupied. I see that the courts have just decided against "Willie" in the legal protest that he filed, and, since Leary is now dead and "Willie" out of the service, the famed naturalist's case is now closed. Safford, who is now a bughunter in the Department of Agriculture, was noted, while in the Navy, for being the greatest linguist wearing the blue. His linguistic accomplishments made him famous, and his soft, dulcet voice, gentle manners, and other peculiarities earned for him the cognomen of "the most lady-like officer in the service."

A New Reef at Annapolis

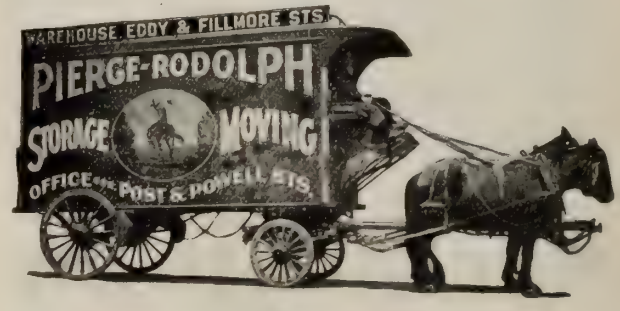
I learn with a great deal of interest the curious fact that of the thirty upper classmen at Annapolis now being kept there during the leave period to study up in the subjects in which they were deficient last year, nearly all have fallen by the wayside in English. This is a new one on me, and I am at a loss to account for it. In former years, when J. Russell Soley and "Widow" Craig headed the Department of English Studies, History and Law, at the Naval Academy, a high standard of English was maintained. Mathematical studies were the main reefs for the midshipmen to run upon. On the principle that a man's social position may be largely measured by the language he uses, it might appear that the midshipmen of the present day are somewhat more democratic than of yore.

Chandler's Command



Lieutenant Lloyd H. Chandler, son of former Secretary of the Navy William H. Chandler, is on the eve of conducting an expedition which, if successful, will add considerably to the already high professional prestige of that young officer. He has been placed in charge of a "destroyer" flotilla composed of the Decatur, the Barry, the Bainbridge, the Chauncey and the Dale, and he is to take these little vessels on the long and often stormy voyage from New York to Manila. Chandler is certainly competent to command the expedition, for he is an excellent officer in every way. He has ever exhibited remarkable tact which won for him popularity from the start with juniors, equals and seniors at Annapolis. He entered that institution while his father was Secretary, a circumstance which the upper classmen were not reluctant to remind him of during his "plebe" days, when they wanted to make him miserable.

Hazing That Helps



"Billy" Brownson, the present superintendent of the Naval Academy, has just joined with Secretary Moody in the periodic announcement that "hazing is abolished," or is about to be abolished, or some other such twaddle. Hazing will probably never be entirely abolished there, as long as boys are boys. It may be latent for a while, as it has been for short times now and then in the Academy's history. Of course, hazing of the cruel, injurious kind should never be tolerated, and, as a matter of fact, the brutal hazing has long since been eliminated by the sentiment of the midshipmen themselves. In its present mild forms, "running," as it is called, teaches a man self-control, respect for seniors, habits of command, and other necessities of discipline, besides undoubtedly developing pluck and pertinacity and endurance. A man who cannot endure the "running" at Annapolis has not in him the making of a naval officer. Most significant of all is the fact that the "plebes" as a whole do not themselves want the practice abolished. The hue and the cry against it come wholly from the fond mammas and papas, who are appealed to by a few homesick weaklings, and they arouse the uninformed public, which is not aware of the fact that the man who is "plebe's" worst "runner" during his plebehood is generally his best friend thereafter. There is rarely any malice in it, the practice being nearly always comical. One of the greatest hardships imposed upon the "plebe" is the denial to him of the right to laugh during the "running," as most of them are aching to do. Men educated to fight both moral and physical battles in after life gain nothing by being cuddled.

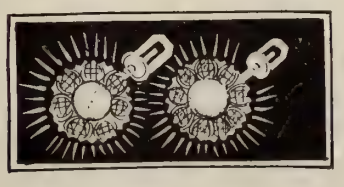
turning from long periods of service abroad, who are particularly well known, both in and out of the Navy. I may mention Lieutenant-Commander Otway C. Berryman, of the Marines, whose career in the corps has been decidedly distinguished; Lieutenant-Commander "Jake" Luby, than whom no officer, in his younger days, has ever had more success in controlling the lively apprentice boys of the Navy, and Lieutenant G. H. Mather, of the Marines. Mather is the son of the actress, Margaret Mather, and entered Annapolis some years ago, but failed to graduate. At the outbreak of the Spanish war he volunteered and was made an ensign in the Navy. At the close of the war he was relegated again to civil life, but soon secured a Lieutenant's commission in the Marines. "Jake" Luby's popular wife arrived at the Occidental hotel some days before the Solace came in, and was the first to greet her long-absent husband.

Result of Favoritism

A brief announcement was made recently of the death in Manila of Colonel Richard I. Eskridge, U. S. A. It was casually stated that he had been brevetted captain for gallantry in action against hostile Indians at the Infernal Caverns, Arizona, in the early seventies. That appeared to be all that was remembered of him. Yet Colonel Eskridge was known throughout the army as a gallant soldier, a man who had won distinction, and who should have been among its highest officers, but who, because he had no pull in Washington and was content to devote himself to his duties, never turning aside for a moment to seek the pleasant places, was permitted to go on the retired list as a colonel. His case is worthy of more than passing notice in these days of gross favoritism and theatrical management in army affairs. He was a graduate of that stern school of war, the Rebellion. Each rank from second lieutenant to colonel came to him by seniority, and during the more than forty years of his service he never had a day's staff duty. He always preferred to be with the troops. At Santiago, as Major of the Tenth, he was terribly wounded while doing service as battalion commandant, and for months he was carted from hospital to hospital in the effort to save his life. Finally, after his recovery, he was assigned to command one of the new regiments, and about thirty officers immediately asked to be transferred to it merely because it was commanded by gallant Dick Eskridge. But his command was short-lived. Retirement came, and he went on the list as a Colonel, while a young doctor with absolutely no military training is wearing twin stars.



I hear that the engagement of Miss Mary Harrington's sister will soon be announced. The latter is said to be only waiting for Mary's marriage with Lieutenant-Commander Niblache to send out the tell-tale notes. Her fiance, so say the wise ones, is in the Navy, and his crush has been noticeable for some time past. The Harrington girls' penchant for the Navy is natural, as they were brought up in that branch of the service.

Rebukes to Courts-Martial

The serenity of the Navy has been rudely disturbed, within a few days, by two scathing rebukes to courts-martial, in rapid succession, by high reviewing authorities —no lesser persons than Rear-Admiral Robley D. Evans and Secretary of the Navy, William H. Moody. They sorely reflected upon the omniscience and jurisprudence of the courts, the former in the case of Paymaster Nicholson, who was found guilty of drunkenness and of attacking an elderly civilian, who happened to be a German Consul, and the latter in the case of Ensign Ward K. Wortman, who was charged with the responsibility for the fatal explosion in one of the turrets of the Massachusetts, by which nine men were killed. Evans berated the members of the court so roundly for the trivial sentence they imposed upon Nicholson that I cannot understand how they refrained from tendering their resignations, or taking some other vigorous step in remonstrance. As for the Wortman case, it looks very much as though Moody were making himself ridiculous by his inexpert meddling in matters so deeply technical that no civilian, unfamiliar with the complexities of modern naval ordnance, could possibly master them. Wortman's case was essentially technical, it was passed upon by experts, and there was no question of morals about it, as in the case of Nicholson.

Miss Isabel Kenna, of Oakland, who last week became the bride of young Mr. Burrell, is not only the niece of Father Kenna of Santa Clara College but also the cousin of Frank Sullivan.

Benjamin Ide on the Philippines

President Wheeler did not distinguish himself at the recent meeting of the Unitarian Club, when the topic of discussion was "The Philippines." It was Professor Bernard Moses's night to shine. He was the guest of honor and made an interesting and instructive address on our over-sea possessions. Wheeler imagines himself a great extemporaneous speaker and he is seldom prepared. His remarks were scattering in the extreme. They rarely hit the subject under discussion. He seemed to be conscious of this himself for he apologized for their random character. When Wheeler had finished one club member remarked jokingly to another in the hearing of a large crowd, "Well, which did you prefer, Moses on the Philippines or Wheeler on the Philippines?" To which the other replied, "I heard but one address on the Philippines."

Her Letter

(Which was written but never posted.)

By Bessie L. Russell.

Dear John:—I have been thinking of it for some time, but not until now have I dared to write. I hope that you will forgive me, John, and will read what I have to say for myself. I hope that you will read it if only for the sake of what I once was, but what I can never be again.

It does seem strange to be writing to you in this pleading fashion, I who never pleaded for anything. It seems so unnecessary, too, in view of all that we used to be to each other, John; yet I realize full well that it is necessary, that I have forfeited all right to your love. I feel it deeply, too, for when I did that reckless thing and left you, John, I had no idea what I was running from. I hadn't, indeed. Had I only known your true worth in those old days, all would have been different, John. But I didn't. I was so young, so giddy, so vain. I loved the admiration of men. I was hungry for their flattery. You were too plain for me then. I was so tired of that smooth black suit you always wore, and your dark hair, which was always too smooth and oily, and our plain country home, so devoid of excitement and life. In short, John, I longed for one deep breath of wild exhilaration. Then I met Markham. You remember Markham, that yellow-haired college fellow who boarded with us that summer? He was so interesting. He told me such tales of the city, where he said in the very nature of things I belonged. And John, when he made such desperate entreaties, I did fly with him, as you know. I did, John, but not for love. That was my sin, that I did not love him—no, not for a single moment. I yielded only because I was flattered by his attentions, and because of a romantic idea that it would be grand to live the gay life in the city, to leave behind the captious cares of farm life. But, John, dear, the picture was over-painted. It was not real happiness; it was only veneer. I hate it now, and I hated it then, so soon as I found out the deception of it all. But I could not turn back. That is the pity of it, John. With us women we risk all in a single move. My God, we lose all! How often have I thought of you, in the weeks and months and years that have elapsed since I saw you. How often have I wondered if you loved me still, or if your love had turned to hate. Five years ago—it does not seem so long—five years ago this night, you took me in your arms and called me your Adelina. Adele, you said, was not so sweet a name, and then you told me of a woman who was as good as she was beautiful and her name was Adelina. Ah, John, John, how could I have treated you so? How could I? Only once since then have I seen your face. You were in the city and you passed directly by me, John. I could have touched your sleeve in passing—that same old-fashioned black sleeve—but I dared not. You were alone, too. I was glad of that. I hope that you are still alone. I could not bear to think of—of any one's taking my place, John. Maybe someone has. I hope not. Somehow, I feel that I will be spared that. John, I don't care how smooth your suit has grown; it's not the clothes but the man that counts. I don't care how free from the barber's touch that dark hair seems. It's the head beneath the hair! And oh, John, above and beyond all, it's the heart beneath the manner. They are all well groomed, these city men, and their manners are as polished as their clothes, but their hearts are like chunks of ice. I have felt the chill of them, I can tell you, and I want no more of them. John, I want you. I want you now. It was only a woman's freak, that running away from you. This is what I have so longed to tell you, but what I have never dared to until now. This is what I want you to know. You have a right to know it. And now that I have told you all, I'll stop, John. I'll stop for fear I weary you, and I wouldn't weary you for worlds. I mean it, dear; I mean it sincerely. I mean all, too, that I have written. Write me that you believe that I do, John? Adele.

Lady Betty

By John Roberts.

Lady Betty possessed that rare, divine gift of silent sympathy. Perhaps that was why young Paddington went to see her so often; perhaps there were other reasons.

He stirred his foot with marked uneasiness and looked moodily ahead. Instinct told her that he had forgotten the sweets, but she made no sign, only drew a trifle closer.

"Betty," he exclaimed, suddenly wheeling around, "Betty, it's the end of the rope, and we've been going down hill lately as fast as the devil can drive. A pretty tandem, eh, Betty? Now, look here," he pursued, earnestly, "there is only one thing to do—pull up and go slow." Evidently this conclusion had been deduced from a severe premise. "It may ruin, old girl—but it's one more chance, and then, lose or win, we throw up the game. We have been going a swift pace, this six months, the devil's own gait; but, so help me, this is the turn, and with you for a pal, we'll pull through somehow."

For answer she put her head on his shoulder, and her soft eyes gazed dreamily into his.

Paddington took out a note-book and began hastily adding up a column of wild numerals. He swore a little, and rubbed out a good deal, and all the while Lady Betty stood patiently by, watching. Her sire was noted for his prowess, and she had the pride of blue-blooded ancestry in her veins, but for all that, the mathematical side of her bringing up lacked finish. Finally her visitor slapped the note-book to, and thrust it into a back pocket.

"Betty," he said tenderly, the frown disappearing from his brow, "Betty"—he lingered over the name, smoothing out her floss-like hair—"you're the best friend a chap ever had; better than the men who drink the wine I pour out, better than the women who smile when a fellow's able to pour it. Do you know, girlie, I'm tired of it all; tired of trying to be a gentleman; tired of going to the devil! It's the mater's letter that did it, and it came like a whiff of honeysuckle. Dear, simple old mother! She wants us to come home for a spell; she wrote all about the crops, and the cow finished calving, just as though the old farm hadn't slipped out of the minds of you and me. That's what hurt, Betty! God keep her from the sight of her boy now, a wreck—a broken-down sport—and—perhaps, worse!" He buried his head in Betty's neck, and she felt something warm and damp. "Betty," he continued brokenly, "do you remember the stars over the paddock—and the warm, still nights, and—oh, those roses! the smell of those roses! And—and—Phillis!"

She moved her head and sniffed sympathetically, as though filled with the vision of Phillis.

"Well, I won't blubber any more; but it's do or die this time, and so help me God, it's the last!"

He pulled himself together with a jerk, and looked at her Ladyship critically.

"Hang it, old girl," he cried excitedly, "you're a thoroughbred, no mistake! And the prettiest legs in the country belong to you!"

She turned her head away, perhaps in confusion at this indelicate allusion to her perfections, but her heedless admirer went on: "My beauty, we'll show the rest of them a step or two!" He threw up his hat ecstatically: "Hurrah for Lady Betty!"

The object of his enthusiasm gazed at young Paddington thoughtfully—and wondered.

A yellow drag swept in at the gate and drew up with a flourish. A girl on the back seat waved a striped sunshade to a languid individual in a tan ulster. The individual fixed a glass to the satisfaction of the left optic, and advanced.

* * * * * * * *

"Well?" he interpolated.

"Where is Mr. Paddington?" inquired the girl, bending down so that no one could hear her.

"Dick Paddington?" he drawled, "why, with Lady Betty, of course."

She threw back her head resentfully, and became intensely interested in the adjustment of her field-glass.

"Is your Langtry going to run?" she asked after a long pause.

"Yes," answered the tan ulster, settling itself on the drag's hub, "third race, side issue, small thing, four to one."

The girl looked conscious, got red, poked her parasol, and then asked hesitatingly: "Is Mr. Paddington's horse down for today?" Her cheeks deepened in color. "If it does run," she hazarded boldly, "will you please put this up for me?" She added this shyly, her rose tint a glorious carmine at the request.

The individual reached up for the gold piece, and held it meditatively in the palm of his hand.

"I wouldn't," he said slowly, after long consideration; "she's bound to lose. Larkspur is the pick of that bunch. The filly's had her day."

The sunshade came down emphatically.

"Please," she said haughtily, "please put it on Mr. Paddington's horse."

The bell rang. The track seemed to empty itself in a black ribbon that curled around the fence. After a while the noise died down, and the interest began to gather for the second race.

"Larkspur!" some one whispered to a companion. A bystander looked unconscious, but took the tip and put his money on the same.

"In the mile handicap Larkspur's sure to win, no fluke this time," confided the friend. A young man leaning on the fence smiled cynically, as though he had other views. Bender, a heavy plunger of the turf, swaggered up. His eyes were fixed on Craps, his jockey. He looked mysteriously at the rider of Larkspur, as though to convey a secret warning. The jockey gave the horse a cut as the line drew in form. The animal reared and looked ugly. Tompkins on the filly came quietly in place. The brown filly put her ears back and snorted impatiently. The bell sounded a second time and the line broke. The filly was third choice in the race, and Tompkins got her well away. He let her go with the leaders around the first turn, and when once straightened out, up the back stretch, turning her head to the last place in an eighth of a mile. So quickly did the filly apparently drop out, that a great many thought she must have been cut down.

While Tompkins was taking wraps on the filly, Craps was hustling Larkspur, the favorite. Everything in the field was racing as hard as straining sinews knew how. The grand stand went mad as the runners swept round the other side of the course. At the head of the home stretch Tompkins cut the filly loose. She had plenty of vim left, and made up the distance to the leaders at every stride. At the paddock Craps, who had been taking things easy on Larkspur, got a bit frightened, and went to the bat. That settled it. Larkspur faltered as they flashed by the finishing post, the filly thrust her long smooth neck out in front. Surprise held the black ribbon, and then tore it into a hundred threads, amid wild cheers. The grand stand poured out into the aisles, and then out into the open. The band started up, and the breath of violets on some woman's gown came pleasantly on the breeze.

Craps led the defeated Larkspur sullenly. Tompkins grinned in triumph as he led the drooping filly.

The young man who had been leaning on the rail turned a white face to the pair.

"Tompkins," he said hoarsely, "I'll take her in."

He caught the bridle and put his hand on the steaming flanks. The filly whinnied joyfully and rubbed her soft nose on his sleeve, her dark eyes luminous. Thus the girl on the drag saw them turn in at the stables. The individual looked almost animated as he sauntered up and handed her a neat little roll of bills. She sighed and turned them over absently.

"Lady Betty," said young Paddington, as he laid the blanket over the steaming flanks, "Lady Betty, old girl, it's the home run now, for this was our last race!"

THE STAGE

The Elizabethan Drama

Some people may like their Shakespeare unadorned but after seeing a performance of "Twelfth Night" by the company representing the Elizabethan Society of London I am constrained to express a preference for the up-to-date style of production with all the embellishments and accessories that serve to lighten the tax on the imagination. All that can be said in favor of playing Shakespeare as Shakespeare played himself is that it insures against stage waits and quickens the action, but at the same time you get more of the bard for your money than you really care to have. The Elizabethan Society is doing good work in vindicating modern stage management and extenuating the emendation of Shakespearean plays. If you are a student of the immortal William, and admire his plays principally for the literature that is in them, you will appreciate the Elizabethan style of production, but if you go to the theatre to be entertained, and to have your interest aroused by stagecraft as well as by story, you will prefer the judicious cutting and slashing of the skillful modern stage manager. Ben Greet and his associate players give a very satisfactory performance of "Twelfth Night." It is satisfactory because it is instructive. It gives you an adequate idea of the limitations of stagecraft in the days of Shakespeare. You appreciate the handicap under which thespians labored in that remote period. Unfortunately the members of the company are not seen at their best in the play. Constance Crawley's Viola is an agreeable impersonation, but she fails to grasp the subtleties of the character. The Olivia of Alys Rees was very stagey, and Robert Smiley was an ideal Sir Tobey only in appearance. His gruff speech was too gruff to be understood. He did most of his talking into his ruff and his articulation sounded like an echo in a barrel. Ben Greet is a most remarkable Malvolio I have ever seen. He is grave and saturnine at all times, and he never invests the role with that effervescence which some actors affect, and which distracts from its solemnity. He plays the role as though Shakespeare intended Malvolio to be a senile old gentleman. There is nothing of the exuberant coxcomb about Greet. His characterization may be Elizabethan, but it is contrary to all the traditions of the stage. And by the way, I am inclined to doubt that the production is strictly Elizabethan. If it is much that we have read about the stage in the Elizabethan period is all wrong. I suspect that Mr. Greet has been having a little fun at our expense. If he had stuck to "Everyman" we might not have had our eyes opened. The most strictly Elizabethan features of the production were the "beef-eaters," who stood in uniform at each side of the stage. They were from Paul Gerson's school of acting, and reflected much credit on Mr. Gerson. They stood well for three solid hours. Mr. Gerson knows how to put muscle into the legs of his pupils, but he gives them a severe test. Robert Forster is an ideal Sir Andrew and Olive Currie does excellent work as Antonio. Dallas Anderson works very hard as the clown.

Another Carmen

The latest Carmen in town is Cleo Marchesini of the Tivoli's Italian opera company, a robust little woman with a rich contralto, and a very fine set of teeth which are never under cover. The signorina has a good conception of the role but her dramatic execution is not always faultless. Her histrionic art is somewhat crude in those scenes in which she exercises the blandishments of the wanton. As a flirt she lacks finesse and grace, but she has considerable dramatic force, and she and Emanuele Ischierdo, the Don Jose of the cast, invest the powerful last act with tremendous tragic interest. Her singing of the role is far more artistic than that of the much advertised Collamarini, for she is fairly well versed in the vocal art, and though her registers are not blended, her singing is at all times pleasing. In the lower register her voice is that of the so-called female baritone of the vaudeville stage, and in the upper it has the rich contralto quality. Ischierdo is a capital Don Jose. He plays the part with much fervor and intensity, and his singing is at all times dramatic. Zanini is a capable Escamillo, and his action in the toreador song is most eloquent. Adelina Tromben is a sterotyped Michaela. She sings sweetly but she affects that stiffness which most women who have essayed the role seem to consider necessary to betoken the simplicity of Don Jose's sister. One word more: the ensembles are sung better than they have been for many a day at the Tivoli.

Gregoretti's Triumph

Never has the Tivoli given a better performance of "The Barber of Seville" than that of Monday evening. The Figaro of the cast was Gregoretti and a more waggish or laughable barber it would be hard to find. His comedy never for an instant dropped into buffoonery and never once interfered with his vocalism. His solos were given with a sparkling vivacity that was irresistible and throughout the entire opera his spirited and brilliant acting enthused the singers as well as his audience. Adelina Tromben as Rosina was quite a graceful figure in her black and gold Spanish dress, and she sang the arpeggios and trills of Rossini charmingly. In the lesson scene she gave a waltz song by Guagni-Benvenuti called a "Lesson in Trilling" and for an encore gave a "Theme and Variation" by Proch. Tedeschi as Almaviva sang with considerable brilliancy. Cortesi as Dr. Bartolo was amusing and Travaglini as Don Basilio was deliciously droll.

JAMES DURKIN

Mr. Durkin will be the leading man of the new Alcazar stock company, which opens October twelfth, when he will make his local debut as Donald Heron in Pinero's "Lady Bountiful." This is the part created in London by Forbes Robertson. Mr. Durkin is a native of Quebec, Canada, where his father was Commissioner of Crown Lands. He is a college bred man and an actor of great experience, having a repertoire of some two hundred leading roles, including D'Artagnan, Orlando, Ingomar, Mephisto, Romeo, and such widely divergent parts as Billings in "Too Much Johnson," Joe Saunders in "My Partner," Senator Rutherford in "The Wife," Prince Dimetri in "Resurrection," and the title role in "The Middleman."

Is a Pleasant Tooth and Mouth Wash. Preserves the Teeth from Decay. Hardens and Prevents Inflammation and receding of the Gums.

The modern woman's stationery is as much a part of her nowadays as her dainty wardrobe. Cooper & Co., 740 Market Street, are showing the newest modes in paper and envelopes, dies and seals.

Ford-Compressed Weyman

"A Gentleman of France" is such a rattling good novel that you would sit up all night to get at its finish. "A Gentleman of France" transformed into a play is a hopeless puzzle, a melange of shouts, sword-play and lords and ladies. Few dramatic novels are worth the time spent upon them by the adaptor. "The Prisoner of Zenda" was an exception. We haven't seen "Ben Hur" yet to judge. Far better would it be to stick to the old "Three Guardsmen" than to attempt to force the market with weak versions of Weyman's strong romantic novels. But there is one scene in "A Gentleman of France" that would be wonderfully effective if the woman element were eliminated. This is at the end of the second act where De Marsac does an Horatius stunt, holding a stairway against six or eight men, and by the might of his sword sending them to kingdom come. It is a thrilling moment, but the thrill has a ridiculous climax. Mademoiselle de la Vire springs to her lover's aid and punctures one of the assailants, and plants her foot on his chest David-vs.-Goliath fashion, to receive the plaudits of the gallery. However weak the play, the Grand has been filled all the week, for the Neills are great favorites here. James Neill himself acts the hero, and he does all that can be done with poor Ford-diluted De Marsac. Miss Chapman brings Mademoiselle de la Vire up-to-date and wears some beautiful costumes. Simon Fliex is very well acted by John W. Burton, and Fanchette, by Lillian Andrews, is brightly drawn. Neill has a new beauty in his company this season, Ruth Hickstein, who plays the Countess de Grammont.

ISADORE RUSH

Miss Rush is the Lady Holyrood of the "Florodora" company which is to open at the Columbia Monday night. She is the wife of Roland Reed, the comedian. She is one of the best dressed women in the profession. She is to have the leading role in "The Medal and the Maid" when the piece is produced in New York early next year.

Neill's Managerial Eye

Gertrude Keller is still with James Neill's company. Mr. Neill discovered her in Los Angeles over two years ago. He was present at a recital given by a dramatic school and Miss Keller was one of the pupils who took part. She is a modest young woman, and had no expectation of being chosen for Mr. Neill's company, but she was. Out of a number of more beautiful and showy dramatic aspirants, Mr. Neill's eye sought the modest violet. He believed she had talent, and engaged her, and she has been a member of his company ever since. Mr. Neill, by the way, seldom makes mistakes about the choice of recruits for his organization, but once he did. It was in the East, and he thought the girl had ability. He engaged her, a stunning looking creature who had been, I believe, a society girl. But she showed little aptitude for her work, though she was gifted with an overweening conceit and self-confidence that made her persona non grata to the company, and carried her through her stunts fairly well. One time they were playing a three-act farce in an Eastern city, and the ex-society girl rebelled because hers was a thinking part.

"I think you might give me a line or two in the banquet scene," she said.

"Very well," answered Mr. Neill, remembering all the trouble the belligerent actress had caused him, "you may say just as the company arises from the table, 'I am a ham.'"

"Shall I bring a ham?" she questioned.

"No," returned Mr. Neill, "that speech shall be a confession, not an address."

The New Alcazar Stock

Adele Block, the new leading lady, is a very stunning looking woman of considerable stage experience. She was the original Iras, the Egyptian girl in "Ben Hur," and leading lady for E. H. Sothern and Henrietta Crossman. Frances Starr was for three years ingenue at the Murray Hill in New York, and John B. Maher, for the past five years comedian of the famous Pike stock company of Cincinnati. Juliet Crosby, Harry Hilliard, George Osbourne, Marie Howe, Adele Belgarde, Eleanor Gordon and Walter Belasco will also be of the company. Fred Butler will be stage director as heretofore and Harry Spear stage manager. An endeavor will be made to surpass all previous efforts in the staging of "Lady Bountiful," and the church wedding scene, with its surprises and its hits, will be wonderfully realistic. The sale of seats for this event begins next Monday morning.

EDYTHE CHAPMAN

Miss Chapman is the popular leading actress of the James Neill company, and a great favorite with San Francisco playgoers. She will have a splendid opportunity as Cigarette, the French vivandiere in "Under Two Flags," which will be the program at the Grand Opera House the week beginning tomorrow matinee. She has been highly eulogized for her performance of this character.

Stockwell's Latest Triumph

L. R. Stockwell, the breeziest of legitimate comedians, is once more entertaining San Francisco theatregoers. Stockwell has experienced more vicissitudes than fall to the lot of the average man even in the theatrical profession, and he has encountered most of his hard luck right here in San Francisco, but he would rather be playing here than in Broadway. That astute manager, Billy Brady, thinks so much of Stockwell that he stands ready to back him as a star any day, but the little comedian cannot find a play that he thinks worth while. Just now he is at the Central in a play that seems peculiarly suitable to his temperament, "A Temperance Town," but it has been worn threadbare on the road. However it is new to patrons of the Central, and it still affords much amusement to many people who still think that Charley Hoyt has never been surpassed by any farce comedy writer. Mink, in "A Temperance Town," is one of the characters that fits Stockwell like a glove. If it had been written for him it could not have been a more congenial role. Stockwell has been getting a tremendous reception night after night. And by the way he is getting capital support from the Central stock notwithstanding the violent transition from melodrama to comedy. Not only do the leading members, Mr. Mayall and Miss Lawton, do excellent work in the roles assigned to them, but even some of the lesser lights manage to illumine scenes in which they appear. Elmer Booth does some felicitous work as the son of the inebriate, and Henry Shumer is also effectively cast.

MR. RAYMOND W. PECK

Mr. Peck is a writer of successful musical comedies who has just come to town from Chicago to assist in staging some new pieces at Fischer's theatre. The first, "The Paraders," will be seen for the first time next Monday night, and will be followed by "Rubes and Roses" and "Tom Tom." These burlesques are unlike the Weber-Field burlesques, but are said to be full of ginger and abound in catchy music. Mr. Peck is a Yale graduate

Anna Lichter and her husband, William Schuster, are back in town waiting for the Tivoli's comic opera season to open. Both have been singing in musical comedy in the East, but they are tired of touring with road companies, and would much prefer a permanent engagement at the Tivoli. Another old-time Tivoli singer, Belle Thorne, has returned to town. She came direct from Europe to visit relatives here. She says she has an offer to sing in Germany.

Tyndall to Tell Us of "The Elixir of Life"

Now that Dr. McIvor-Tyndall, the wizard of the mind, has promised to tell us the secret of his defiance of all the laws of nature, it is to be expected that Steinway hall will not be large enough to accommodate those who will attend the lecture tomorrow evening. Tyndall has chosen for his subject "The Elixir of Life," and if the lecture fulfills the promise of the title, we may at least expect to learn the secret whereby the famous student of the unknown has defied time, and become so youthful in appearance as to be mistaken for his own son, by those who saw him when here some twelve years ago. Even the most conservative of materialistic scientists are beginning to hint at the discovery of the secret of perpetual youth, and so it is not at all unlikely that Tyndall, the most advanced of the students of metaphysics, may have found the long looked for law governing physical rejuvenation and decay. The lecture is causing a sensation at any rate, and it is more than likely that standing room will be at a premium. There was a splendid audience last Sunday night, to hear what Dr. McIvor-Tyndall had to say on "Clairvoyance." The lecture proved to be an excellent exposition of the phenomena of clairvoyance from the standpoint of the latest postulates of materialistic science, illustrated by some wonderful demonstrations of the faculty. Sunday evening, October eleventh, Tyndall will repeat part of his lecture on "The Thought that Kills," treating of the scientific cause of decay and death. There will also be psychic demonstrations.

Features of Next Week's Bills

When Blanche Bates appeared here in "Under Two Flags" it was Cigarette who monopolized all the interest. When the Neill company presents the play at the Grand, beginning tomorrow matinee, Bertie Cecil will be as much of a personage as the vivandiere. James Neill will have the role of the dashing guardsman and Miss Chapman will be Cigarette. The Grand management wish distinctly to impress upon the public that the regular matinees take place Thursday, Saturday and Sunday. The Bothwell Browne juvenile company of one hundred and fifty will appear the week beginning Sunday matinee, October eleventh, in the burlesque extravaganza, "Cleopatra."

Arthur Cunningham, the operatic baritone, will make his vaudeville debut at the Orpheum, in numbers calculated to display his magnificent voice to the best advantage. As he is a tremendous San Francisco favorite he is sure to be accorded a warm welcome. The Clayton White and Marie Stuart company, great favorites in this city, will reappear at the Orpheum, in "Paris." The Golden Gate Quartet, assisted by Fanny Winfred, are capital singers and make changes of costume during their turn. The celebrated Pantzer Trio, assisted by Mrs. Carl Pantzer, return after three years of success in England and on the continent, in "A Gymnast's Parlor Amusement."

The sixth week of the Tivoli grand opera season will have "La Boheme" and "Otello" as the bills. Agostini, Dado, Zanini, La Spada and Tromben will have the principal roles in the former, and Ischierdo, Gregoretti, Tedeschi, Benedetto and Miss Barker in the latter.

At the Chutes will be Fischer and Wacker, comic Tyrolean singers, direct from the principal music halls of Germany and London; Larkins and Patterson, colored performers, in new songs and small talk; Louie Dacre, "the funny lady," and Excella, the pretty contortionist. Pongo, the ferocious baboon in the Zoo, shares attention with the babies in the life-saving incubators.

TYNDALL ON "THE THOUGHT THAT KILLS"

"Florodora," the Columbia's new bill, has twice visited us and judging by the large advance sale of seats, is as much a favorite as ever. In the list of one hundred people coming this time are Isadore Rush, R. E. Graham, Philip H. Ryley, Thos. A. Kiernan and others as well known. Miss Rush is one of the best-dressed actresses on the American stage. Mr. Graham was the original Cyrus Gilfain and Philip H. Ryley has played Tweedlepunch for the past three years. The chorus has seventy members.

Florence Roberts will have but one more week at the Alcazar. "Zaza" being retained for her farewell, including the Thursday and Saturday matinees.

Fischer's will have a distinct novelty Monday night in "The Paraders," a musical comedy that had a long and prosperous Chicago run. The piece is said to be brilliant with wit, and full of exceptional music, songs and specialties, all absolutely new to San Francisco. There are two great acts, one at Coronado Beach and the other on the battleship Oregon. The scenes are said to be marvels of the scenic artist's brush. The costumes entailed an outlay of over six thousand dollars and the management say that this is not exaggerated a whit. Particular attention has been paid to the novel stage effects, which promise to be a big surprise. Seats will have to be secured early for the first week.

The second week of L. R. Stockwell's starring season at the Central will be given up to that favorite farce, "My Friend from India," with Stockwell as A. Keene Shaver, the barber who gets mixed in identity. The support will embrace Mayall, Shumer, Emery, Howell, Booth, Nicholls and Whipple, Misses Lawton, Kane, Vane, Howe and Woodthorpe. The superlative character of the attraction is sufficient to assure another week of packed houses at the Central.

The Genius of Boucicault

The fertility of Clyde Fitch has occasioned much surprise because at the age of thirty-eight he has written twenty plays and twelve adaptations. Dion Boucicault wrote more than four hundred and every one was acted. To Boucicault the modern stage is more indebted than to any other single individual. Boucicault was the first man to "box a scene"—that is to say, he was the first to show a room with walls and doors instead of presenting palace, hovel, and woodland alike by flat stretches of canvas pushed partly on the stage in grooves. It was he who made "Treading the boards" a cant phrase. Until he came players trod the bare boards in sober truth, no matter what the scene, for Boucicault was the first man to lay a carpet on the stage. Moving scenery was first introduced by him. Gauze waters were unknown before "The Colleen Bawn," and countless other stage contrivances were the fruit of his tireless invention. As an innovator, he is also entitled to reverence from two classes of playgoers connected with the theatre if not linked to any great extent with dramatic art—the matinee girl and the "matinee idols," for Boucicault gave the first matinees—then in reality moving performances—that were presented in America. Yet in his later years it was not upon his achievements as author, actor, or craftsman that he dwelt most fondly. In the intimacy of his home he acknowledged to more pride in the facts that he had helped to lay the foundation of Joseph Jefferson's fortunes, that he had introduced Henry Irving to London, and that he had broken lances in behalf of Ireland with England's ablest Conservative and had not been worsted. For years, while he was turning out play after play, he was embroiled in a political controversy with the late Lord Beaconsfield on the rights and liberties of the Irish people, and today the Irish people are testifying their ingratitude by hissing his plays.

Bornemann Still Lives

Often have I wondered what had become of Fred Bornemann, the basso who played Mephisto in "Satanella," at the Tivoli, in the early days of that opera house. The other day my curiosity was satisfied. In a New York paper I read that the veteran opera singer, who is now sixty-nine years of age, is suing his wife for divorce in that city. His wife is only thirty-two years old. Shortly after their marriage in 1896 they went into the business of selling supplies for cooks and waiters. Bornemann was at one time stage manager of the McCaull Opera Company.

MUSIC

[Communications addressed to this department should be received not later than Wednesday noon.]

Augusta Cottlow

Miss Cottlow is the pianiste who created such a furor in this city as a child wonder some years ago, when she astonished our music lovers by playing a Chopin concerto with the Bauer symphony orchestra. She will appear at the three concerts with which Manager Greenbaum will inaugurate the musical season at his charming new hall, "The Lyric." Since her appearances here Miss Cottlow has met with great success in the leading cities of America and Europe, and particularly in Berlin, where she had the distinction of being engaged three times in one season as a soloist with the Berlin Philharmonic Society, with which organization she subsequently toured Holland. Miss Cottlow has not only achieved success as a soloist, but also as an ensemble player. The arrival here of a talented young German violinist, Mr. Natorp Blumenfeld, gave Manager Greenbaum an opportunity to arrange some fine ensemble features which will be added to the originally proposed recitals and with the assistance of Arthur Weiss, the well known cellist, Rubinstein's brilliant B flat major trio will receive a magnificent rendition. Mr. Blumenfeld will also contribute a number of important violin soli, and at the matinee concert, by special request, Miss Cottlow and Mr. Blumenfeld will play Beethoven's Kreutzer Sonata. On Friday night, October sixteenth, a concert will be given at the Unitarian church, Oakland, and the concerts in this city will be given on Tuesday and Thursday nights, October thirteenth and fifteenth, and Saturday matinee the seventeenth. The box office will open Wednesday morning, October seventh, at Sherman, Clay & Co.'s, where complete programs may be obtained.

Fine Church Music

The congregation of Emanu-El synagogue has enjoyed some remarkably fine music during the celebration of its festival. On New Year's day, last week, the music was equal to any given in the New York synagogues. Wallace A. Sabin was at the organ and played in masterly and artistic style. Louis von der Medden Jr. rendered a 'cello solo during the "silent devotion," with organ and orchestral accompaniment, that was a beautiful thing. It was composed by Cantor Stark, who composed or arranged all the music given during the various festival exercises. On this occasion the choir consisted of twenty professional singers, assisted by an orchestra of twelve instruments. The ensemble work was a marvel of precision and harmony, the chorals giving evidence of careful drill and practice. The Shofar service was very impressive, particularly the trombone calls, this instrument being substituted for the ramshorn of the ancient Hebrews. Homer Henley's big bass came out strongly in this part of the service. Miss Helen Kelly, the contralto, gave an effective solo, but Mr. Vinson, the tenor, did not prove so satisfactory. He has a voice of rather limited volume, though he manages it well. But really valuable church tenors are as rare as black pearls. In the closing hymn, Miss Daisy Cohn, soprano of the regular choir, did some wonderfully good work. Her bell-like tones, so free from the tremolo that mars many otherwise fine voices, came out clearly and sweetly. Her tone shading and modulation were admirable. The Cantor's individual work in the service was arduous, but his voice showed no signs of fatigue at the close. His work included the reading and chanting of English and Hebrew prayers, and the rendition of a solo before the sermon. The last was his own composition, based upon an ancient Jewish melody, abounding in quaint trills and full of color. On Wednesday evening the feast of the Day of Atonement was celebrated, and was continued on Thursday all day, special music being a feature. It was of a most elaborate character, particularly at the memorial service Thursday afternoon.

Last Symphony Concert Next Tuesday

Dr. H. J. Stewart's "Montezuma" suite will be an interesting feature of the final symphony concert next Tuesday afternoon. The music was heard at the last midsummer jinks of the Bohemian Club and created a profound impression, which should be deepened by its rendition by Scheel's orchestra. Dr. Stewart has composed much fine music, notably an oratorio and three comic operas, beside some charming songs. The symphony to be rendered next Tuesday will be Schubert's in C major, and Beethoven's "Leonora" overture (No. 3) will be the opening number. Liszt's second Hungarian rhapsody will also be given.

The Roeckel Twins

Last Tuesday evening the talented Roeckel twins celebrated their eleventh birthday by giving an operatic recital. It was given in costume, which added very much to the effect produced by these remarkable little ones, who can render operatic arias in French, Italian and English, acting the scenes so intelligently. Mario sang the serenata from "Trovatore," the tenor recitative and arioso and prologue from "Pagliacci," and other numbers, without a break, and Maria gave numbers from "Cavalleria," "Linda" and "Faust." The crown of her rendition was the spinning and jewel scene from "Faust," that long and exacting selection, which is a memory tax aside from its musical difficulties. She was a prima donna in miniature, in her pretty costume, her own blonde hair in the long braids of Marguerite. The latter part of the program was given up to lighter selections, English, Scotch and Irish songs. Among those interested in the recital of the twins were Mrs. E. W. McKinstry, Mrs. Austin Sperry, Dr. Giulio Rottanzi, Judge Seawell, Mrs. M. J. Lemman, Sylvain Weill, Madame Sorbier, Mrs. Shannon and Madame E. G. Lyons.

Miss Maud Goodwin, daughter of H. D. Helmcken, K. C., M. P. P., of Victoria, B. C., will make her first appearance before a San Francisco audience at a song recital to be given by her teacher, Edward Xavier Rolker, next Thursday evening. Her voice is a lyric soprano, and she is gifted as well with a rare histrionic talent. She is now preparing herself for an operatic career, and goes East in October to complete her plans for that purpose. For nearly three years she was under the tuition of Miss Withrow, in London, but before that time, and since her return last fall, she has received her vocal instruction from her present teacher. Miss Goodwin's repertoire from classical and modern composers is very comprehensive; among its selections are Marguerite in "Faust"; Elsa in "Lohengrin"; Elizabeth in "Tannhauser," and Aida. Miss Goodwin's numbers in this concert will consist chiefly of modern English, French and German selections. She will be heard also in the Rigoletto quartet, a duet from "Lakme" and other pieces. Those who assist at this concert are Miss Mignon Judson, a rare contralto; Miss Gertrude Wheeler, and Mr. Joseph Rosborough. It is a complimentary affair, admission being by invitation only.

Music at Stanford

At Stanford Memorial church last Sunday the sermons were supplemented by some exceedingly fine music. Master Warner Sherwood, a fourteen-year-old boy soprano, sang Handel's "Angels Ever Bright and Fair" at the morning service, and in the afternoon, "I Know That My Redeemer Liveth," and Marston's "God and Father While I Stray." His sweet, symphethetic voice filled the great church. Mr. Scott Brook's organ selections were also greatly appreciated by the congregation which gathered from not only the University but from all the country thereabouts, including Menlo Park, San Jose, and even from San Francisco.

When Adelina Was Young

Adelina Patti was always very outspoken, and strong in her own opinion. When she was a little girl she was once taken to a performance where a new prima donna had won a success to which the little singer thought she was not entitled. Adelina remarked, at the end of a trill that had won enthusiastic applause, "I think you did that very badly, indeed. You should have sung it so." Then she illustrated the point for the surprised lady's benefit. "And, though I had never studied the trill, I seemed to get it right," she added in telling the story later. Otherwise she was very like other children, devoted to her doll and waiting for the sound of the ice-cream man's voice.

"To the enthusiastic player the hours and hours of practice necessary to master a composition are his chief happiness; he takes a pleasure in conquering difficulties. Enthusiasm stimulates the imagination, and the executive musician who possesses enthusiasm is lifted to the level of the creative artist. He invests the compositions of others with his own imagination; satisfies, for a time, at least, all his wishes and desires."

Miss Ena Langworthy, who has established a studio here, has had splendid training in piano, harmony and theory. She studied in New York, and then in Boston under Carl Faelten, whose system for children is regarded so highly.

The pupils of Mrs. Frances Moeller gave a recital in Byron Mauzy hall on Wednesday evening, too late to be reviewed here.

Tomorrow (Rosary Sunday) there will be special music at St. Dominic's for the high mass at eleven o'clock. Caesar Franck's celebrated Mass in A, which has never yet been heard in San Francisco, will be sung by the regular choir, assisted by several extra voices, soloists Miss Camille Frank, Miss Ella V. McCloskey, T. G. Elliott and C. B. Stone. Hummel's "Alma Virgo" will be sung at the offertory, and Miss McCloskey will sing Stewart's "O Salutaris," with chorus. The harp obligato to the mass will be played by Madame Marquardt, and the 'cello obligato by Theodore Mansfeldt. Dr. H. J. Stewart is the organist and musical director.

Elgar's Light of Life

Trinity church was filled and many stood through the entire service last Sunday evening, when the tenth monthly special musical program was rendered. Edward Elgar's "Light of Life" was presented for the first time in this city, by Trinity choir, numbering forty voices. Edward Elgar has won first rank by his "Dream of Gerontius" and other works, and is pronounced by worthy authorities as the peer of any living composer. The "Light of Life" is a magnificent composition, full of beautiful and original ideas, and is very difficult both for singers and accompanist. It was given intelligently and with smoothness, the shading and phrasing being remarkably well done, especially as Mr. Eaton was at the organ, where he could only control his singers by his manipulation of the instrument. Miss Una Fairweather, the contralto, did most artistic work, her voice lending itself to every variety of expression, and she showed musical intelligence of the highest order. Miss Millie Flynn was suffering from a severe cold and her voice was not therefore heard to the best advantage. Mr. Olssen and Mr. Morgenstern, two pupils of Mr. Eaton, took the baritone parts and did very acceptably, Mr. Olssen possessing a fine high baritone and Mr. Morgenstern a large, rich basso cantante. Mr. Vinson sang in his usual good manner. The accompaniments, extremely difficult, were well done by Mr. Eaton. Not once were the voices overwhelmed, and great variety with quite an orchestral effect was produced.

The Pasmores and Miss Anne Moore gave a concert last night in aid of the Presbyterian church, Vacaville. This was a return engagement, they having given one for the same church in the spring. On October the ninth the Pasmores will give a concert at Stanford for the benefit of the musical clubs. They will be assisted by Louise Smith, soprano, and Mrs. Edith Collins, contralto.

Miss Moore, Miss Countryman, Miss Johnson and Dr. Brown, who sang so charmingly at the reception given in Miss Bell's studio last week, are all pupils of Mrs. Jessie Dean Moore, who was one of the hostesses of the occasion.

—The Music Critic.

A Good Substitute

"You say she has no ability, and yet she always has a good engagement. Perhaps she has the artistic temperament highly developed?"

"No, she hasn't even that."

"Then what has she?"

"An angel."

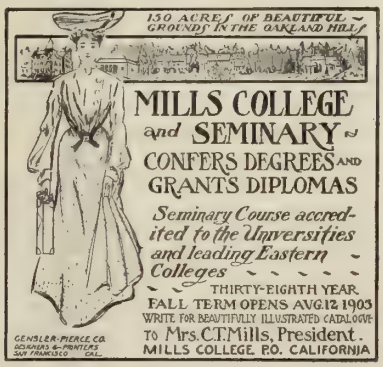
The position of concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, vacated by Frank Kneisel, has been filled by the engagement of Fernandez Arbos, a young violinist of Spanish birth, who has for some years been a teacher at the Royal College of Music in London.



In Lotus Land

Let me live within my dreams;
The joys I know
From shadows grow;
Transient lights from nothing burning
Back to nothing swift returning;
Life can hold no happiness like that which seems.

Let me love and then forget,
Each vintage sip
With careless lip,
Drain the cup and then destroy it,
Hold no memories to cloy it;
I would have no dark remorse to chill and fret.

Let me keep my altar fires
Bright with incense from illusive, vague desires—
Flames well fed;
Flouting Fate, cajoling sorrow,
Heedless if a sad tomorrow
Find me dead.

A NEW LAW

The Board of Commissioners in Optometry, according to a new law enacted by the last Legislature, has issued a Certificate to Mr. George Mayerle, the German Expert Optician at 1071 Market Street, authorizing him to practice Optometry and prescribe glasses to those having weak eyes and poor sight. Mr. George Mayerle has probably prescribed glasses to more prominent men of the world than any other optician in this country. The fact that the highest U. S. Army, Navy and Government officials and most eminent clergymen, judges and educators of California are using his glasses should be sufficient evidence of his wonderful ability to treat most complicated cases with accuracy and absolute perfection.

Commander U. S. Navy. MARE ISLAND, CAL., July 20, 1903. MR. GEORGE MAYERLE—Dear Sir: The eyeglasses you made for me are the most satisfactory pair I have had in the last thirty years. Check in payment is enclosed herewith. Very respectfully, W. W. KIMBALL, Commander U. S. Navy.

The President of Santa Clara College. MR. GEORGE MAYERLE—Dear Sir: The glasses ordered came in good time. They are excellent and I am more than pleased with them. Yours very truly, ROBERT E. KENNA, S. J.

Office Chief of Police. It gives me much pleasure to recommend to the public, Mr. George Mayerle, of San Francisco. I have been using glasses for the past four years, and during that time have consulted several opticians, but not until I had consulted Mr. George Mayerle and had him fit glasses to my eyes did I get entire satisfaction. Respectfully, J. H. ANDERSON, Sergeant of Police.

Admiral Dewey, who used George Mayerle's glasses during the Spanish-American war, and is still using them with much satisfaction, highly recommends Mr. George Mayerle, and sends the following testimonial: MR. GEORGE MAYERLE—My Dear Sir: I am still using with much satisfaction the glasses you sent me at Manila; also the new ones suit my eyes perfectly. Yours very truly, GEORGE DEWEY.

Automobile Topics

Probably never before did so many automobiles appear on the ocean boulevard as were seen there last Sunday. All were anxious to see the British bark Gifford and those who had horseless carriages at their disposal drove out to Ingleside and then out to the beach. Dozens and dozens of the motor vehicles passed me and the chuff-chuffing was heard practically all day, from one end of the boulevard to the other. Several Wintons passed me and at the wheel of one I noticed Mr. E. E. Peabody. Mr. Charles C. Moore drove another. Mr. Peabody was accompanied by Mrs. Peabody and Mr. and Mrs. A. T. Morton of Oakland. In the carriage with Mr. Moore were Messrs. Jesse Poundstone and Howell, both of Colusa. Mr. D. E. Jarnett and Mr. C. C. Eib drove to the beach last Sunday in a Stevens-Duryea.

Mr. John Craig, a great automobile and tennis enthusiast of Woodland, was in this city last week and purchased a Stevens-Duryea gasoline machine. Accompanied by Mr. Chester of Woodland and Mr. F. A. Lathe of this city, Mr. Craig left town in his new auto a week ago on the trip to Woodland. At eight p. m., September twenty-fifth, the party took the steamer for Vallejo. Friday night was spent in a hotel at Vallejo and at 11:30 last Saturday morning the vehicle was started for Woodland. The first three or four miles traveled over were full of chuck holes and the oil on the road was from an inch to six inches in depth. Fifteen or twenty miles after that the road was very hilly and sandy, but the party encountered no hills which they were unable to climb. From there on until they reached Vacaville the road was in fairly good condition with the exception of deep dust. Vacaville was reached in safety and the Duryea was again started at two o'clock that afternoon, no more stops being made until they arrived in Woodland, at four-thirty p. m. The distance covered was about seventy-nine miles and the actual running time was about six hours.

Among the sales of the White Sewing Machine Company last week was a "White" touring car to Mr. F. A. Hyde. Mr. Hyde, who is president of the Automobile Club of California, is one of the most enthusiastic automobilists of San Francisco. Mr. Hyde has long owned a machine but last week sold his horseless carriage and purchased a "White" tourer. His first trip in this machine was made two weeks ago to San Jose, and last Sunday the president of the A. C. C. toured Alameda county.

Last Saturday I heard a motor vehicle approaching from the rear on one of the drives in Golden Gate park. As I turned around a big four-cylinder Locomobile, the first I have seen here, whizzed past with Mr. Brinegar among the passengers. Later I learned that it was the horseless carriage of Max Fleischmann, of Cincinnati, Ohio, which machine he had expressed here from the East. The machine is attracting quite a bit of attention among local people as it is the first one that has ever been seen here. Mr. Fleischmann will probably be here for the November race meeting and may enter this big car in some of the events.

Touring has found much favor among local automobilists and each week many of the horseless carriages are seen across the bay touring either to San Jose or Del Monte, or about Berkeley, Haywards and Oakland. The south drive of the Golden Gate Prk is also used by many more autos than heretofore. Robert Tolmie in a Cadillac drove to San Jose last week and William C. Hayes and his wife and party also journeyed to the garden city in a Cadillac. A. M. Shields with his wife was out in a "White" stanhope and A. E. Cooper drove his Cadillac through the Park with a party of friends. Harvey Dana and Charles Hanley of Alameda went to Contra Costa in their Knoxes.

Probably next week it will be learned definitely whether Barney Oldfield is to come to San Francisco for the race meet of the Automobile Club of California in November. At that time Charles B. Shanks, who has already left Cleveland for San Francisco but who is going in a roundabout way, having many racing matters to attend to for the Winton people, will arrive here. It is expected that he will definitely let us know whether the great Eastern automobile racer and the American champion driver of a motor vehicle will compete in the local races. It is stated that Oldfield said he will not be able to come but secretary E. P. Brinegar of the Automobile Club of California feels certain that the champion can be persuaded to come. Of course it will be a great thing for the local event if Oldfield is a participant and the autoists will then see a driver whose daring and reckless driving, as it may be termed, is thrilling.

The National Automobile Company has received from the Daimler Automobile Company of New York a twenty-passenger bus with an engine of the famous Mercedes type, which won the James Gordon Bennett race in Ireland. Though this bus is the first one that has ever been brought to the coast, many more are expected.

Some of the vehicles sold last week were: Mr. D. E. Jarnett of Colusa, a Stevens-Duryea; Mr. Frankenheimer, of Stockton, a Cadillac; Mr. C. H. Geldert, of San Jose, a "White" touring car; C. Roullier, a Cadillac; D. F. Maher, of Watsonville, a Haynes-Apperson; George A. Richie, of Hanford, a Rambler, and Frank Boggs, Arthur Wright of Stockton and George Young of Modesto all bought Ramblers. —The Chauffeur.

LETTERS

Mrs. Bigelow's Novel

One does not proceed far with Mrs. Poultney Bigelow's novel, "The Middle Course," before the question begins to obtrude itself, "Why did she do it?" It is still there at the end. There are thousands of books just as inefficiently trashy, which is no excuse for adding one more to the pile. The names which she selected for her characters are a fair index to the quality of the novel. There are Nellie, Althea and Clarice and the ghost of a "cheild" named Violet. The men are Bertie, Oliver and Clement, quite like an old Fireside Companion combination. Althea and Oliver are unhappily married, and not mated at all. Oliver does not love his dear angel. His passion is yachting, and Althea cannot yacht, so he leaves her alone much of the time. Oliver is rich, but he doesn't empty his purse into his Althea's lap, and as she has nothing of her own, she cannot buy pretty clothes, hence the incompatibility. Granted that Oliver wasn't the Archangel Michael, neither was Althea a seraph, and as she couldn't do a blessed thing toward her own support, it ought to have suggested itself to her as a bad move to quarrel with her bread, even though the butter was scanty, till she had some security of another supply. Clement Moorlake has been the hero of endless romances and the ideal of school girls since the art of fiction was first invented. He is a sculptor this time, by way of variety, cold and cynical. He had a heart which he lost fifteen years before the opening of the story, and he neither recovered it nor got another in its place. Althea, as a matter of course, and a highly virtuous wife, wouldn't think of falling in love with any one. She wants only friendship and sympathy, and some one to lean upon, and Clement has done all the loving he is ever going to. What the author means for a tragedy takes place when the virtuous Althea visits Clement alone in his studio a few months after their first meeting, and the villainess widow Clarice finds it out and reports to hubby. He hastes him to prove or disprove her report, and comes upon Clement and Althea, she with her hat and wrap removed, locked in a loving embrace. Brute that Oliver is, he will not stop to listen to the natural explanation of such a scene, that it is quite harmless and only a farewell forevermore. He hastens home, dismisses a part of the household retinue, orders the child's things and his own packed, and betakes himself to South Dakota, where he secures a most iniquitous divorce, which gives Mrs. Bigelow a chance to denounce the heartless husbands who perpetuate such outrages on confiding wives, quite oblivious to the fact that the Dakota divorce colony is not exclusively a male settlement, and that wives, too, take advantage of the laxity to procure separations on trivial complaints, and without other proof of their allegations than the default of their husbands. Then Althea begins a game of hide and seek with Clement Moorlake, in which she shows much more eagerness to hide than he does to seek, so they play a desultory game of "I spy," across the channel and around England, and at last Althea wearies of the sport and concludes to die. Meanwhile, after the manner of the melodramatic heroine, she weeps plentiful tears over the little shoe of the "cheild," which she also made her only reason for not leaving the wicked husband before he left her. It would have been the only sensible act chronicled of her, if she had departed this life, but mindful of the happy ending, Mrs. Bigelow lets Moorlake discover that it is Althea and not his first siren that he really loves, and the villainess widow, Clarice, is given a chance to repent and bring them together, so the "cheild" and its shoe are forgotten and orange blossoms take the place of tears, and the whole thing amounts to as much as the futile query, "Why is a hen?" Published, with illustrations, by the Ess Ess Company, in a style that is entirely too good for it.

Fiction for Girls

Gwendolen Overton will follow her "Anne Carmel" with a book for boys and girls, "The Captain's Children," which will make its appearance as soon as the serial publication comes to a close. If Miss Overton, or any one else can write books for girls there is an open field before her. The boys do not suffer so much from neglect. If there is nothing remarkably good prepared for their selection, there is plenty that is readable and not to be despised. But in all the years since Miss Alcott's death there has been no successor—no one who has written about live little girls, living and working and playing and growing as children do. Occasionally there is one odd book, or perhaps a chapter or so in which the girls are not impossible little prigs or else women of the world in short frocks. There are still left a goodly number of little girls who have not had the childhood kindergartened out of them, and who still love to play with dollies and dishes, and ask quaint questions, instead of knowing it all and pretending to find their joy in working cardboard mottoes for the poor. If there is a writer with the ability to tell stories for their benefit, it would be a work of mercy for her to do it, and forego the production of historical romances and problem novels.

An Author Worth Reading

The announcements that this or that writer will shortly publish another book follow each other with wearying regularity, and the books are on such a dead level of mediocrity that there is not one writer in a hundred whose promise of another addition to the procession of printed pages attracts more attention than the creaking of a rusty hinge. Not so Ellen Glasgow. She is not an author of the while-you-wait stamp, and perhaps because of this her books are worth waiting for. Those who remember with pleasure her "Descendant," "Voice of the People" and "Battleground" will be ready to give her new book, "The Deliverance," the reception which it is sure to deserve. This is also to be a Virginia tale, with the scene, however, laid amongst the tobacco planters in ante-bellum days. Miss Glasgow is traveling leisurely in Europe at present, having completed her work and made her arrangements for publication six months ago. It is a characteristic of this writer which might be copied with advantage by others, to keep very quiet about what she is doing. Instead of having the streets covered with straw, all traffic forbidden and armed guards posted at the corners to prevent interruption, while a daily bulletin is sent to the literary press, all to the end that some poor, cheap bit of imitation may be produced, Miss Glasgow goes quietly about her self-imposed task and we never hear anything about it until it is all over. Then we get a book worth a baker's dozen of the kind in which the kodak keeps tab on every tick of the typewriter. The Bookworm.

Defendants

Action brought in the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and the Complaint filed in the office of the Clerk of said City and County of San Francisco.

The People of the State of California send Greeting to:

A. C. Freese (Administrator of the Estate of Pierre Langaron (deceased), Eleanora O. Salmon, Eleanora O. Salmon (as Trustee) Louise Emile Salmon, Francis Salmon, Alfred Salmon, Eleanora Alexandrina Salmon, Joseph Reavilo, also known as Jose Raviolo, otherwise known as Jose Raviola, Jean Marcellin Pourguery, Tomas Pidello, Guillaume Pache, Jean Pache, Gaspard Sadony, Eleanora O Salmon (Executrix of the Last Will of Francis Salmon, deceased) John Doe, Richard Roe James Black, Mary Green and Mary Doe, also all other persons unknown, claiming any right, title, estate, lien or interest in the real property described in the complaint adverse to Plaintiff's ownership, or any cloud upon Plaintiff's title thereto.

YOU ARE HEREBY DIRECTED to appear and answer in an action entitled as above, brought against you in the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, within ten days after the service on you of this Summons—if served within this County; or within thirty days if served elsewhere.

And you are hereby notified that, unless you appear and answer as above required, the said Plaintiff will take judgment for any money or damages demanded in the complaint as arising upon contract or he will apply to the Court for any other relief demanded in this complaint.

That the property involved in and affected by said action is described as follows, to wit:

All that certain lot, piece or parcel of land, situate, lying and being in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, commencing at a point where the Northerly line of Union street intersects the Easterly line of Dupont street; thence running Easterly along said line of Union street Twenty-three (23) feet; thence at right angles Northerly Thirty-four (34) feet and four and one-half (4½) inches thence at right angles Westerly Twenty-three (23) feet to the said Easterly line of Dupont street, and thence Southerly and along said line of Dupont street Thirty-four (34) feet and four and one-half (4½) inches to the point of commencement.

That the object of said action is to obtain a judgment and decree of the above entitled Court adjudging and determining that the above named defendants and all other persons claiming any right, title, estate, lien or interest in the real property described in the plaintiff's complaint adverse to plaintiff's ownership or any cloud upon plaintiff's title thereto have not, and that none of them has any estate, right, title, lien or interest whatever in or to said real property, or in or to any part or parcel thereof, and that the title of plaintiff is good and valid, and that said defendants and all of said persons unknown as aforesaid be forever enjoined and debarred from asserting any claim whatever in or to said real property, or in or to any part or parcel thereof adverse to the plaintiff, and for such other, further and additional relief as to the Court may seem meet and proper in the premises, and for costs of suit.

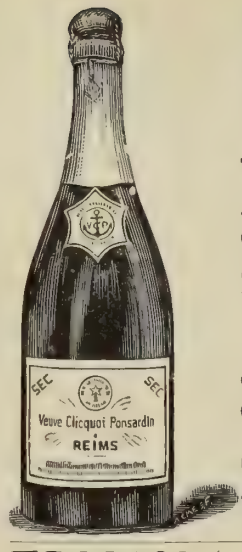
You can trust any number of men with your money, but mighty few with your reputation.

Superiority makes every man feel its equal. It is courtesy without condescension; affability without familiarity; self-sufficiency without selfishness.

There's nothing helps convince some men that a thing has merit like a little gold on the label. And it's pretty safe to bet that if a fellow needs a six or seven-syllabled word to describe his profession, he's a corn doctor when you come to look him up in the dictionary.

The lady on the dollar is the only woman who hasn't any sentiment in her make-up.

Marie Bashkirtseff: We all think alike, then; the only difference is the way we express our thoughts; as men are all made out of the same material, but how widely do they differ in feature, form, complexion and character.



The finest feelings are the most easily ridiculed, and where mockery enters delicacy of feeling disappears.

Champion Blingum III Talks

The pretensions of these aristocrats make me fatigued. Blue-blooded indeed! There's only one blue-blood in these parts since the Prince left, and that's myself, Champion Blingum III. My ancestry, now, is ancestry. My blood has the genuine violet tinge. My family tree is the real thing. It's a real sorrow to me that I have to live outside my circle, as it were, to have as master a man whose father made his fortune in vulgar trade. He was a grocer, as they call it in this country.

But I wasn't going to boast of my ancestry when I started to talk. A thoroughbred never boasts. He takes it for granted that everybody knows he's it. It is only your parvenu who has to lug in the genealogical tree at every breath, so people will think he really had one. I can always size up an aristocrat by the way he talks. If he is always running in words like "blue blood," "culture," "the common herd" and that sort of thing, I know he originally sprang from the canaille. If he's hail fellow well met with everybody, yet maintains his dignity without "standing upon" it, then I know he's an out and out thoroughbred—a Champion with generations of sangre azul in his veins.

Now, there are all sorts of people living down here. They are tremendously swell as regards house, equipages, liveries, clothes and manner, but they can't fool me. I know that this one's father was a poor farm boy before he went into the car-building enterprise and made a fortune. That woman was a milliner in London before she married a rich ship-builder and became a leader of the ton. I met an English prize-bull at the last bench show who told me all about her. Then that young man who sets himself up as a howling aristocrat had a grandfather who lived in a bog-shanty in Ireland and didn't know his alphabet. The grandmother of those haughty young matrons who set the styles for this part of the world kept a boarding-house.

I'm not snobbish. I have nothing against these people. I know gentlemen and gentlewomen who have no "Norman blood" in them, yet are Nature's aristocrats. What I dislike is to see these un-grandfathered nobodies setting themselves up as The Aristocracy, snubbing their betters in blood and breeding because they happen not to possess wealth to back them, and riding and walking about as if the Earth were made for Them Alone.

If they only knew how I, Champion Blingum III, whom they pet and call "Dear doggie," despise them and their tissue-paper pretensions! Pah!

A Contingency, C. O. D.

"Mrs. Impecune has a nice baby boy," observed Dr. Pills; "arrived this morning."

"I hope they will pay your bill," said his wife, "after you brought them that nice boy."

"Mamma," piped in Billy Pills, "will papa take the baby away from them if they don't pay his bill?"

—The Listener.

At Sunday-school, last Sunday, the lesson was about the Good Samaritan. After the teacher had finished her lesson she questioned the children about the details.

"Whither did the Good Samaritan take the wounded man?" she inquired of one infant.

"To a hotel," answered the city child.

This Spirited Campaign

This is to be a very lively campaign, and one in which candidates are to be subjected to very deep scrutiny. The Examiner has awakened from its lethargy, and is showing its contemporaries how to make a fight. It is a long time since the Examiner was so spirited and aggressive as it has been since the opening of this campaign. The Monarch is himself again. Mr. Hearst is making up for lost time. He is seeking to mollify the disgruntled Democrats who have been denouncing him for his infidelity in the gubernatorial campaign, and he will no doubt ingratiate himself into their favor again. The Republican bosses have afforded him a splendid opportunity, for they have nominated for office some men who will never be canonized. But the people of this city may be depended upon to discriminate intelligently. They will no doubt re-elect those Supervisors who have served them honestly, but as it is presumed that they are cognizant of the claims upon their gratitude of faithful members of the city's legislative body, the presumption is also warranted that they have intelligently estimated the hollowness of Mr. Lane's pretensions. His record as City Attorney does not bespeak his fitness for the exalted position which he now seeks. He is no better now than he was when running for Governor of the State, and the objections the Examiner had against him then are as well founded today. He is more of a political hack now than he was a year ago. He is still the pliant tool of McNab, who expects to capitalize him in the event of his election, and to profit in the same manner as Abe Ruef has profited during the present Administration. During his political career he has proved himself a transparent mountebank. He started out as a public advocate of temperance on the pay-roll of that old charlatan, Dr. R. H. McDonald, of Pacific Bank notoriety. Later on he became a newspaper man, and after failure in that profession was admitted to practice law. For every hour which he devoted to his profession he spent ten dabbling in politics, and through his relations with McNab he secured the nomination for City Attorney. The important litigation in that office has been transacted by his deputies, and whenever an opinion was written on any subject Lane was always ready to write a contrary one if political or private exigencies demanded. This is the man who is represented as being specially qualified to conduct the affairs of this municipality on business principles.

The Anti-Schmitz Campaign

The administration of Eugene Schmitz is being bitterly scored in the dailies. The editors appear to have suddenly awakened to the fact that an unholy alliance exists between the Mayor of the city and a mercenary politician who has never been distinguished for his scrupulous character. This somewhat tardy awakening of the dailies is likely to be viewed with suspicion. When a public official enjoys immunity from criticism for nearly the entire term of his office, and having become a candidate for re-election is made the target for stinging abuse, people may be constrained to doubt the sincerity of those by whom he is attacked. The American people are disinclined to be influenced by campaign criticism. This is especially true of the people of this city, for they have very little confidence in the local press. They know that the daily papers are conducted as personal organs, and that they espouse public interests only when those interests do not conflict with the aspirations of the newspaper proprietors. Town Talk is the only paper in San Francisco which has faithfully chronicled the doings of the Schmitz-Ruef partnership from the day that Mayor Schmitz made announcement of the relationship that had been established. The dailies were silent, either because of favors received or a lively sense of those to come. The partnership between Ruef and Schmitz was the most brazen compact ever entered into by an official of this city, and though its purposes and its achievements were well known the press maintained an attitude of complaisance. But now the dailies are thundering their disapproval of the methods and practices of the past two years, and they expect the public to believe them actuated by their solicitude for the welfare of the city.

The City Beautiful

That the dailies no longer exercise great influence is evident from the comparatively small vote cast at the bond election. The dailies were in favor of a bond issue for all the purposes set forth in the proclamation, and they sought to arouse public interest in the scheme to improve and beautify San Francisco, but only a small percentage of the voters went to the polls, and several of the propositions failed to carry. The voters discriminated fairly well, despite the arguments of the newspapers. They expressed their disapproval of the proposition to establish public parks for the booming of real estate in certain sections of the city, it being the opinion of many, no doubt, that we should first expend money on those improvements which shall benefit the whole city. A few years ago the people of this city voted to extend Golden Gate Park to Van Ness avenue, but owing to the ignorance of Mr. Franklin K. Lane, who is now a candidate for Mayor, the proceedings preliminary to the issuance of the bonds were adjudged invalid. Notwithstanding the fact that the people had declared themselves in favor of the extension of the park, the Supervisors failed to provide for that grand project at the late election, but sought instead to have bonds issued in the interest of a few districts. Town Talk is in favor of beautifying San Francisco, but we believe that we should perfect a boulevard and park system for the whole city before seeking to boom private property in a few districts. No city in the world has greater natural advantages for a park and boulevard system than those possessed by San Francisco, and we should take advantage of them. Before adding to the public squares in remote sections we should extend the Park to Market street, and we should also purchase the Laguna de la Merced property, with its beautiful lake, a mile in length, and make it an adjunct of Golden Gate Park, and a part of the general system which includes the Presidio and the superb Ocean Boulevard. But we need not expect people to enthuse over such costly projects until they have been sufficiently enlightened as to the benefits that are bound to accrue from such enterprise. There has been an awakening in the East, but we of the Pacific coast are in a benighted state. It is impossible to arouse enthusiasm on the eve of a bond election. A strong sentiment is setting in throughout the country in favor of organized effort to secure beauty of appearance for our cities, and to save and use their natural advantages. Congress has appointed a commission to study the opportunities for still further developing and embellishing the city of Washington, and for years Boston has been considering the question of the treatment of Copley Square, but San Francisco is proceeding in a haphazard way, with little prospect of accomplishing anything. We should have a commission appointed to devise a scheme for the beautifying of the city. Such a commission would stimulate agitation of the subject, and by the time its report was made the people would be prepared to vote for a bond issue.

The Crystal Baths

Physicians recommend the Crystal hot sea-water tub and swimming baths on Bay between Powell and Mason Streets, terminus of all North Beach car lines.

A School of Joy

Some benevolent philanthropist is about to establish a "school of happiness" in London. Just how he expects to teach the art or science has not been made public, nor whether he intends to confine his efforts to any particular class, or to administer the concentrated essence of happiness in capsule doses, regulated according to the needs of the applicants. In happiness, as in all other things in this imperfect world, "what is one man's meat is another man's poison." The child with its lap full of confectionery and Christmas gifts is usually regarded as a symbol, and we are admonished, from time to time, that we are all but children amusing ourselves with playthings. But the happiness of the child depends entirely upon the discrimination of the good Santa Claus, so that if some merry little maiden were to awake on the morning of the eventful day, to find herself the recipient of a drum, a chest of tools, or a soldier's outfit, instead of the expected dolly, it would take considerably more philosophy than she would be apt to have at her command to support the situation. While Madame Millions craves a few more jewels to add to her hoard, the poor housewife would be lifted from a slough of despond if she had but a whole pair of shoes. The speculator goes wild with joy if he succeeds in cornering one of the necessaries of life, and the laborer gives a sigh of relief when the month's rent is paid. Some are happy only while those around them share their joy, while others are so constituted that their pleasure is adulterated, if not spoiled, unless they feel that they are the objects of envy. There have been theologians who have declared their conviction that the chief ingredient of celestial bliss will be the contemplation of the sufferings of the condemned. When the recipe for universal happiness has been compounded the millennium will have arrived, and we shall each be in possession of the philosopher's stone. There is an ancient tale of a king in search of happiness, who was told that he would achieve his desire when he could put on the shirt of a contented man. So he set forth from his kingdom and traveled all over the world, to find the coveted garment. One after another, he interrogated the men who seemed most likely to possess it, only to find that in each instance there was some IF which stood in the way. At last he found one poor and destitute, but content with his lot, and upon demanding his shirt, behold, the contented man had none.

The Pursuit of Titles

A Lisbon paper recently announced the discovery of a place where sham titles and orders were sold in that city, and that the demand for them was steady. A contemporary affects to be much surprised at this condition of affairs and tries to picture the mental condition of people so abased as to derive gratification from distinctions gained in such a manner. Of course, the free and proud American scorns a title. No one has ever heard of such a thing as bartering American gold for a name. It must be a bad dream that women of this land of the free and home of the brave will enter their names to be voted for at ten cents a vote by the rag-tag and rabble, in order that they may wear the empty honor of carnival queen for a day. No American gentleman was ever addressed as colonel or general unless he had earned his title through military service, and the admirals and commodores—they have all sailed the salt seas. Did an American woman ever sign a hotel register as "Mrs. Colonel," or "Mrs. Major," and is it a delusion that one proud dame once figured as "Mrs. Ex-Pay Inspector"? Can we believe our eyes, that every time some damsel with two coins to jingle together "contracts a matrimonial alliance," the ashes of the ancestral altars are raked to find some dignitary worth mentioning in her pedigree? Only last week a coming bride was described as the descendant of "a retired private soldier." There are firms in London which make a business of "discovering" distinguished ancestry for those who can pay for the luxury, and family portraits, armorial bearings, crests and everything else can be provided to order. One New York lady actually sported a device marked with the bar sinister, so little did she know of its significance. Yet who shall say the American is a tuft hunter? And when it comes down to the point, why should there be more of an outcry raised over the purchase of sham titles in Lisbon than there is over the appropriation of extinct French names and honors, or the adoption, for a consideration, by impecunious Italian nobles? Why is not a Portuguese title bought and paid for as valid as an Italian or Austrian one appropriated or invented as soon as the barber or organ-grinder has flitted beyond the view of the Immigration officers? It was short-sighted policy on the part of the framers of the Constitution not to have provided some form of distinguishment for their compatriots. Theoretically, plain Mister is as good as Prince, but it is what is out of reach that is considered valuable. If we had our own system of rank and title foolish Americans would not fall on their knees before foreign pretenders, nor would our millionaires submit to insult under their own roofs, from insolent foreigners who would be kicked but for their decorative designations.

"The Hub"
Chas Keilus & Co.

The "note of distinction," you know what that means in a man's dress, that indefinable something that places a man apart from the ordinary crowd, an expression of style and personality. All these virtues make our fall models have the "note of distinction."

The Trading Stamp in Church

Still another scheme for inducing church attendance has been inaugurated. At Tonawanda, New York, the pastor has hit upon a plan of giving trading stamps to his congregation, and now the good ladies thereabouts may be seen on Sunday mornings hustling their families into holiday garments and marshaling them to the house of God in order that they may procure coupons enough to secure plush albums, Morris chairs, and the latest novels. No longer will the juvenile trade be carried on, of two Sunday-school cards for a peppermint lozenge, or five for a white alley, for the thrifty mothers in Israel will see to it that their flocks deposit the proceeds of the day's attendance in the family treasury, and the homes will be furnished and the family clothed by the easy process of listening to the sermon. One can see in the mind's eye the proud housewife displaying to paterfamilias the Easter bonnet which cost nothing, and it will be an additional feather in Mary Jane's matrimonial cap that she has earned her plenishing by her attendance at church. One may not call the man irreverent who refers to his church cow or his preacher pig, when the livestock is the proceeds of his church trading-stamp collection, and we may even come to look with complacency on the rivalries of congregations still further augmented by the trading-stamp competition. There is such a variety now that there is almost a stamp for each denomination, and if the Tonawanda idea takes root we may find the Red Trading Stamp Church, the Golden Stamp, the Green Stamp, used to designate houses of worship, instead of calling them Baptist, Presbyterian or Methodist. Will the Stamp concerns offer special inducements to the larger denominations, or shall we see congregations wax and wane according to whether the gifts of the stamp houses are of greater or less value? After a family has accumulated as much property as it craves from one variety of stamp, will there be a defection to some other church, and will missionary labor, settlement work, and all the other devices for inducing attendance on religious worship narrow down to a rivalry amongst commercial houses in the matter of stamp distribution? When the Christmas tree, the summer picnic, the chicken dinner, the candy pull, the church social, the bazaar in its variety, the political preacher, the actor preacher, the bicycle preacher, the operatic choir, and all the other sensations and inducements have been found wanting, perhaps it will occur to some one to try making a church a house of prayer and a place of worship alone. It might be discovered then, that after all the proper mission of a church is not to stimulate rivalry with vaudeville theatres and commercial establishments.

The Mayoralty Contest

The Schmitz and Lane boomers have been making considerable noise during the week. It appears that the Mayor and the Democratic candidate feel that there is a fight between themselves over the labor vote. They have unquestionably made a correct diagnosis of the situation. Schmitz is the Labor Party candidate, and Lane is the champion of labor for political purposes. They will divide the labor vote between them. The contest in this campaign is between organized labor dominated by professional agitators, and political grafters, and the people who have grown weary of industrial disturbances and of the tactics of selfish and unconscionable labor leaders. Party lines are never tightly drawn in municipal campaigns, and there are many reasons why they should sag more than ever this year. Mr. H. J. Crocker, the Republican candidate, will receive the support not only of his own party, but also of all intelligent Democrats who wish to see the city government rescued from the hands of the spoilsmen. He will also receive the votes of many honest workingmen who are not deceived by the hypocritical pretensions of Franklin K. Lane or the vapid appeals of Eugene Schmitz. There are many workingmen who are not in sympathy with the professional agitators. They believe that the methods of those agitators have tended to alienate public sympathy from the cause of organized labor, and they are eager to divorce the labor unions from politics. Mr. Crocker comes before the people, not as a professional politician, but as a business man imbued with civic pride and intent upon development of the metropolis of the coast. He is not interested in any political machine or in the welfare of any boss.

Roosevelt Disappoints the Agitators

The professional labor agitators in the East and the demagogic press are in high dudgeon over the refusal of President Roosevelt to dismiss from the service of the Government a man who happened to owe allegiance to no union. The President refused to comply with the demands of the Unions, on the ground that he was sworn to administer the laws of the land, which were "enacted for the benefit of the whole people, and which cannot and must not be construed as permitting discrimination against some of the people." This stand taken by the President will have the hearty approval of the public. Some months ago the professional labor agitators established very cordial relations with the President, and they were confident that he would comply with their demands for the dismissal of the non-union government employe. They believed that he would be afraid to stand by the Constitution of the United States; that he would prefer to win the approval of organized labor. But if he had done as they desired he would have proved himself a demagogue. And it is not likely that he would have commended himself to the respect of the workingmen of the country. The mass of labor is sound in head and honest in heart, and it has no greater esteem for a demagogue than it has for the professional agitator who thrives by promoting industrial disturbances.

In the Matter of Criticism

BY HARRY COWELL

"Life and Literature, life and the perfect expression of life," says Oscar Wilde, "are the two supreme and highest arts." Equally high and supreme is the art of criticising life and literature. Accepting, for the sake of exposition, the definition of literature contained in the foregoing quotation, the business of the literary critic will now be, not at all to praise or to blame, but to examine writings in the light of certain principles (the criteria employed being plainly indicated or inferred), and to decide how near each writing approaches to being a perfect expression of life—a masterpiece of poetry or prose.

Sainte-Beuve's ambition was to make a science of literary criticism. Other critics have had the like ambition, but no man, probably, ever came nearer to realizing it than did he; and yet he it was who failed, ignominiously failed, to appreciate Balzac. Were Sainte-Beuve's criteria at fault? or did his error lie in the application of them in the case of the immortal author of the Human Comedy? Is there anywhere a more perfect, more complete expression of life than "La Comedie Humaine"? With me you may answer No, and none the less refuse to assign to Balzac the highest place in letters; for you may deny that literature is literature in proportion as it perfectly expresses life.

If I say that many a beautiful poem in the English language contains one or more grammatical errors, I infer that I don't consider sinlessness in the matter of grammar a sine qua non of poetic beauty. The schoolma'am whose hobby is syntax is doubtless not of one mind with me. A critic points out that the eyes of a much be-praised portrait are out of drawing. Forthwith the painting falls in the esteem of a public that would never have noticed the fault in a thousand years. How far ought it to fall? The answer depends on how much importance one attaches to correctness of drawing.

The true critic, in common with the true scientist, never admits, but always avows, both being more concerned in seeing and setting forth "the object as in itself it really is," than in supporting preconceived opinion. The watchword of both is "disinterestedness," and both being loyal to truth will often be found traitors to tradition. However, I fear it is impossible for us mortals to attain to the impersonal point of view, to look at life and literature as if we were principles and not men. Into our most impartial estimates our "peculiar differences" do enter in spite of us, and we who would offer ideally disinterested criticism give personal opinion instead. We like or we dislike; and where in Art is the sister of the "Ought" of morals sweet and magnetic enough to draw our affections to alleged beauties which do not naturally delight us? "I am a sensualist in literature," confesses George Moore. "I may see perfectly well that this or that book is a work of genius, but if it doesn't 'fetch me,' it doesn't concern me, and I forget its very existence." None the less, the object of criticism is culture—the education of choice, the formation of taste, or preference for the best, the truest, the most beautiful, in life and in art. Thomas Huxley, scientist, is at one with Matthew Arnold, critic, when the latter, replying to his own question as to the subject-matter which criticism should most seek, says: "Here, in general, its course is determined for it by the idea which is the law of its being; the idea of a disinterested endeavor to learn and propagate the best that is known and thought in the world, and thus to establish a current of fresh and true ideas"; the scientist, however, naturally, and rightly, as it seems to me, insisting that this "best that is known and thought in the world," includes science, which is nowadays, as is well known, indispensable to complete culture.

Hear, also, to like effect, the dictum of Joubert, whom Arnold considers a "child of light": "To accustom mankind to pleasures which depend neither upon the bodily appetites nor upon money, by giving them a taste for the things of the mind, seems to me, in fact, the one proper fruit which nature has meant our literary productions to have." And what in his opinion a literary production really is may be gathered from the following: "Where there is no delicacy, there is no literature. A writing in which are found only force and a certain fire without splendor, announces only character. One may produce many such, if he has nerves, bile, blood, and boldness."

If, taking the view of Joubert, I assert that Kipling, for instance, has nerves, bile, blood. and boldness; that in his writings are found only force and a certain fire without splendor, and little or no delicacy; and that therefore they are not literature; an admirer may point out delicacies and splendors which I have not noticed or else he may dissent altogether from the dictum of the "child of light."

For myself, I have this to say: Mere muscular writing, in the physical force style, is not literature. Self-respecting readers resent being roughly caught in the grasp of rude Anglo-Saxon words, and to be won must be wooed with delicacy, with words that delight. That it may be literature, writing must be writ lovely as well as large; must be exquisitely luminous, not blaring but beautiful, not glaring but gracious, giving out, not fierce heat but delicious warmth. Literature may, perhaps, horrify, but it must not harrow; may even at times make use of the foulest facts, but must never itself offend.

Amor Fuit

What can relume the extinguished fires of love
And give to kisses once grown careless, cold,
The wondrous warmth, the conscious cling, of old?
Oh, why should lawful repetition prove
The thief of life's most precious treasure-trove,
Which not for fabled gem and finest gold
Shall disenchanted eyes again behold,
But grief-gray ashes in the place thereof?
Lost beauty of a broken dream's delight
No power of men or angels can restore—
No dawn to dead love's lone, indifferent night—
Sea's saddest waves break on the desolate shore
Of that dread land of sorrows infinite,
The land of deathless "death in life"—No More!

The Saunterer

The Schmitz Pace

Mayor Schmitz's band-wagon is a gorgeous, glittering spectacle. His political procession is an imposing pageant, an iridescent dream. The Mayor's campaign is a joyful revel, made glorious by showers of glittering coins of the realm, for the Mayor, be it known, is separating himself from some of the wealth accumulated during two years of partnership with Mr. Abe Ruef. Messrs. Schmitz and Ruef know a good thing after handling it for two years, and they are imbued with a sufficient degree of the gambling spirit to hazard a little of their winnings in an effort to retain possession. Hence the copious flow of coin, evidence of which is to be seen and heard on all sides. Banners are floating on the breeze from Fort Point to Butchertown, from Telegraph Hill to the county line. The Mayor's bewhiskered countenance beams on you from facades along the principal thoroughfares, in saloons, in restaurants and everywhere that men do congregate. Ruef heelers are riding in automobiles with Schmitz banners for distribution, and wherever you go you are invited to accept a little Ruef or Schmitz hospitality. The Mayor is stimulating trade on all sides. He is a royal spender. He has loosened up. Listen to the tintinnabulation of his wealth.

A Club Over Wittman

The Mayor is exceedingly popular in the tenderloin. By his grace we have a wide-open town. In the side-entrances to saloons once more are to be heard the rustling of silken skirts and the clinking of glasses. The Mayor of the city is the toast of the paint-bedaubed sirens of Ellis and O'Farrell streets; he is hailed as the friend and the benefactor of the crap players of Stockton and Powell streets. He expected to have the support of the Police Department and the probability is that he will, for he held a club over the head of Chief Wittman after the removal of George Newhall from the Police Commission. The club was in the nature of a threat to appoint a commissioner who would co-operate with Hutton and Drinkhouse and remove the Chief from office. Sergeant Jerry Dinan was to be slated for the position of Chief in the event of Wittman's removal. Now that Sewer Inspector Reagan has been elevated to the high office of Police Commissioner, we shall soon know whether the Chief has decided to support Schmitz. However, I should be very much surprised if Chief Wittman were not giving his support to the Mayor. We could not have a wide-open town today if Wittman were not interested in the Schmitz-Ruef copartnership. The Mayor could close up every gambling resort and side-entrance in the tenderloin if he desired. His complaisance is significant. On all sides there is evidence of "graft," and somebody is reaping a golden harvest.

Timid Mrs. Fish

Mrs. "Stuyve" Fish, one of the leaders of the fastest social set in New York, said during the course of an interview with a newspaper reporter, in this city the other day, that she purchased her gowns from Paris because it was fashionable to do so. She would prefer to patronize home industry and she would do so if other women would take the initiative, but she did not like "to start the ball rolling." And here we have been laboring under the delusion that the wife of the multi-millionaire railroad magnate was a woman of rare independence; that she was so sure of her social position that she was ready at all times to do anything from shattering the Decalogue to harrylehring in public. But it appears that she is as great a slave to the conventions as the average San Francisco climber. She hasn't the courage of her convictions in even so trivial a matter as the selection of her dressmaker. She has posed as a leader of fashion in New York, but she is merely one of a conspicuous crew which does things that attract the attention of the mob. She is a stickler for the conventions of her particular set. The pace has been set, and she doesn't dare lag behind. If she patronized a New York modiste the other Newporters would no longer consider her stylish, and as nature was not very kind to Mrs. Fish she feels the necessity of the very finest embellishments. Despite her wealth and her social position, she couldn't afford to be less sumptuously gowned than any of the women of the smart push.

Mrs. Drexel's Silver Gown

Mrs. Fish, by the way, spends more money on gowns than any other woman in New York's smart set. But this season she was outshone by Mrs. John R. Drexel, in a gown of silver cloth. A San Francisco matron who is now in New York wrote to a friend a few weeks ago that the Drexel gown was the sensation of the Newport season. She says that the glittering silver threads woven into the crepe de chine were genuine. It was a princesse gown, and except for white lace on the bodice there was no trimming. The dazzling fabric needed no garnishing. The skirt had a bit of shirring and a flounce edged with lace. There was a sash of white satin clasped with a large diamond ornament. If the silver gown in itself was dazzling, Mrs. Drexel's gems were more so. Across her shoulders were four distinct chains, and her large rope of pearls was looped across her corsage. She also wore a tiara and a necklace of diamonds. It is said that the gown will be remembered with Mrs. Fish's flame-colored chiffon and the younger Mrs. W. K. Vanderbilt's sapphire spangled frock. All of them were from Paris.

Mrs. Fish Is Sore

Mrs. Fish has been talking so much on this transcontinental trip that she will find it hard to "square" herself with the Four Hundred when she gets back to New York. In an interview in St. Louis she said that the worst thing that can be said of society is that it is "stupid," but incidentally she took a smash at Mrs. Astor, who is the acknowledged leader of the ton. The Newporters are indignant. They are pouring hot shot into Mrs. Fish. They say that she is chafing and smarting under the skin from a not too successful season. They have also remarked that her tongue has always been better known for its biting darts than for its balmy phrases, and that she was unpopular at Newport during the summer for having made unpleasant comments about Mrs. Goelet, mother-in-law elect of the Duke of Roxburghe. Mrs. Fish was to have acted as hostess at a dinner in honor of Mrs. Mills, but the latter called the dinner off so that she could give a dinner in honor of the Duke, who had just arrived. This dinner was given at the instigation of Mrs. Goelet for the purpose of having her daughter's engagement announced. Mrs. Fish was furious over the luring away of Mrs. Mills, and she said so many unpleasant things that she stirred up much bitterness and divided the holy of holies of the tabernacle of the smart set. And at St. Louis, by the way, she remarked that we are becoming "too wild about dukes and counts." This was of course intended as a smash at Miss Goelet.

After a Few French Models

Miss Doris Jeffrey has gone to New York to join her parents, and incidentally to purchase a few Paris models with which to create a sensation on her return. Some time ago she told an officious matron who did not approve her style that she never saw a decently dressed woman in this city. Nearly every woman who has spent much time in New York remarks the provincial style of San Francisco women on her return. And when a San Francisco woman sees a New Yorker gowned in one of the latest Gotham frocks she considers it vulgar or garish. But about a year later, when the style reaches San Francisco, she thinks it is all right.

Visitors Must Be Good

San Francisco is no longer a safe place for transient philanderers. If you are a permanent resident of the city you may patronize the private apartments of the French restaurants, and nobody will seek to ascertain the why or the wherefore. You may carry on half a dozen liaisons contemporaneously, and tread the primrose path to your heart's content, without the slightest fear of any daily paper exploiting your lecherous diversions, but if you are a stranger in town on forbidden pleasures bent, look out for the reporters or they'll catch you. Captain Strong came to San Francisco with May Yohe thinking that this was an ideal town in which to engage in amorous dalliance. He had heard about our free-and-easy French restaurants, where they guarantee to provide you with a new companion for each course, and he expected to revel in our ultra-bohemian atmosphere as though he were an old tax-payer of the city, entitled to immunity from criticism. But the reporters were soon on the trail of the tenderfoot and they chased him out of town. Undaunted by the sad experience of Captain Strong, Mr. A. L. Barbour, a multi-millionaire of New York, ventured into town in the wake of a pretty actress who came hither to obtain a divorce, and though he behaved himself like a gentleman, and paid due respect to the proprieties, the reporters were suspicious. They believed that he was enjoying privileges to which only the permanent resident is entitled, and they wrote him up in a way that made him take to the tall pines. As Mr. Barbour is a man of family, and a highly respectable church member in New York, I can easily fancy what an awful time he is going to have explaining that he took the trip to San Francisco merely for business purposes.

Safeguarding Public Morals

Los Angeles is once more in the throes of a moral spasm. One of the dry goods merchants of the city recently made an exhibition of hosiery in his windows with the aid of shapely wooden legs, and those dear old virtuous ladies of the W. C. T. U. who have undertaken the task of purifying the world were shocked. They called on the merchant and told him that unless he removed the offensive wooden legs they would boycott him. He contended that the legs were more graceful than many he had seen at the seashore, and he asserted that he had no intention of libeling the gentle sex, but the ladies said they cared nothing about his intentions. They regarded the exhibition as a menace to public morals, and insisted that it be discontinued. The merchant complied with their request. The Chief of Police of Los Angeles is so solicitous for the morals of the people that he objects to card-playing in private residences. Last week he marched into the home of a citizen and arrested several men who were playing poker. One was the manager of the Record. All the papers of Los Angeles have been criticising the administration of the police chief, and it is thought that the raid was prompted by malice.

Fortune Co-operating With Frank Jordan

Frank Jordan of the Supreme Court is just now doing an hilarious two-step with Dame Fortune and has Danae down on his card for the next wild whirl. Croesus, Midas, Plutus and Dives are the only lightweights in the gold class whose records entitle them to climb into the diamond-studded automobile with him. Colonel Sellers in his wildest flights never saw such a stream of Pactolean dough as that which is flowing toward the Jordan rancho. This particular thing that threatens to tilt the Jordan fortunes against the sky has to do with politics, of course. It's a voting machine. Some time ago Destiny, in prankish mood, mixed Frank up in a vague and indefinite way with a machine. In course of time he discovered he was behind the wrong kind of a push button. Just then Destiny woke up, too, grabbed Frank by the scruff of the neck and dropped him, all alive and kicking, plumb into a position behind a voting machine, which he fills to the 'steenth of an inch. All that he can figure out is that he will be kept strenuously busy banking the commissions on the machines that his zealous agents will sell for him. At last accounts he had these commissions for the Pacific coast dodging around the million dollar mark, and the Archipelagoes and Orient were loudly calling for him to ship over his machines and collect his commissions.

Keeping the Supervisors Awake

It's amusing to hear the Supreme Court's clerk tell about his good luck. "Has Frankie hit it? Well, I guess, yes. Look for the bull's eye if you don't believe it. You all know Frankie. Somebody push that button. Yes, one, just the same old lonely one. What's that song about the Dutch? They're all right this time, boys. I left 'em up at Santa Rosa falling over themselves trying to vote on that machine. They're all right now; I'm educating 'em. When you see 'em on the stage again they'll be singing songs about that voting machine. Oh, Frankie's got 'em on the run. (Pushes button.) Yes, same, same all 'round. Voters are beginning to shout all over the coast for my little ballot punchers. Are the intelligent Supervisors sitting up and taking notice how the welkin is reverberating with these demands? Well, I guess little Frankie in't neglecting any chance to wake 'em up and put 'em on to that fact. That means two hun. and fifty thou. in commissions. Sounds pipy, doesn't it? Sounds like a dream. What's that song about 'Dreaming, dreaming, 'twas only a dream'? I'm off the key maybe, but I'm on to this job all right. Push that button and see if I ain't. After the golden flood settles all little Frankie wants is a cot beside the rill and a little brooklet wherein to catch the little troutlet. I'll know in a fortnight whether little Frankie is on top or whether the earth is, and if it's Frankie, why, then good-by to the Supreme Court J-A-N. one. After that date little Frankie would fain soar a space on his new bias-cut golden pinions. Just watch him. Where's that waiter? Yes, same all 'round. Just watch him. You all know little Frankie when he starts."

Just the same, all the friends of Jordan are heartily congratulating him on the great good fortune that seems to be ahead of him in this business venture. The chances seem excellent that over two hundred counties in this State will order the machine this fall. This means a sum in commissions that will keep Jordan and his family a good many years.

An Old Rumor Revived

Madame La Bavarde says that no one is in a position to positively deny the rumor of an engagement between Miss Helen De Young and Ed Tobin. That's strange. I should think that the rumor could be verified or denied either by Miss De Young or Mr. Tobin. They surely know whether they are engaged. I was the first one to give the rumor publicity some months ago, and at the same time I announced that Mr. Tobin asserted that it was without foundation. I believe the same source of information is open to Madame La Bavarde.

She Beat the Barrier

An amusing story is told in connection with the recently announced engagement of Bernie Drown. It appears that she is a member of the News Club, an organization of some eight or ten young matrons and belles who hold weekly meetings at the homes of one another to discuss current topics. It is the rule for members to announce their engagement at club meetings before the news is given to the world. When Miss Drown invited the club to tea some weeks ago there were rumors in the air, and the members arrived punctually at four. Miss Drown was in high spirits, and the conversation was lively, but those who were waiting for the important announcement grew impatient. Time wore on and one young matron became uneasy. Presently the door-bell sounded, and a moment later the maid entered with an interesting looking box. The uneasy matron gasped but Miss Drown did not open the box. Six o'clock came, and the club members began making preparations to depart when the sister-in-law-to-be of the bride-to-be took the bull by the horns and made the announcement. Congratulations followed, and the erstwhile uneasy matron heaved a sigh of relief. As she had an inkling to what was coming she wished to present the first engagement cup, and had ordered one sent up. It arrived ahead of the announcement.

Our Serious Club Women

If [illegible] would cease to take [illegible] seriously this world would be bereft of one of its chief sources of humor. Can any one imagine a more absurd and ridiculous situation than that presented by the social lights of San Francisco contemplating the banishment of the unspeakable Turk by confronting him with a petition signed by their honorable selves? Do they solemnly and seriously think he will take his departure, forthwith and instanter, because they have signified their disapproval of his occupancy of a portion of the European continent? What do these women know about the situation, anyway? What do they know about the Turks or Turkey? They read scare headlines every morning telling that tens of thousands of Christians have been massacred, but all they read is not true. These same women were up in arms over the Spanish massacres of the Cubans. If one-half that was told were true the island would have been depopulated. We drove out the Spaniards, and many American soldiers were slain.

Other Holy Horrors

Then there was that excitement over the massacre in Pekin, when we had glowing pen pictures of the sufferings and hardships of the members of the legations murdered by the bloodthirsty Boxers; and how did that turn out? When the troops had endured incredible hardship through forced marches in order to rescue the survivors and wreak vengeance on their destroyers, they found the ministerial families not only all alive and all well, but in the enjoyment of comforts and luxuries unknown to the soldiers. Again, the American Consul at Beirut was assassinated in the newspapers, and if the hotheads could have transported a fleet of warships by wireless telegraphy, by next morning there would have been no Beirut. There is never a famine, in Egypt, in India, in Russia, in China or anywhere else on the face of the globe, but what the victims number hundreds of thousands, and never a street fracas in any Oriental city but what hundreds of Christians—they are always Christians—are massacred. The Oriental Christian is distinctly unlovely. The recruits to the new faith are drawn from the bottom of the heap, and the profession of Christianity comes in as handy as allegiance to a foreign flag when the Oriental finds himself in the toils of the law.

How They Are Compensated

It is not for his religious profession that the Christian is persecuted, and the missionaries who raise such a clamor over the alleged persecutions ought to be in better business than defending criminals because of nominal Christianity. No doubt the good ladies of our holy city are exercising their minds and losing sleep over that iniquitous institution, the harem, and the danger of beautiful Christian maidens being enslaved therein, but the harem exists only in story books, and the women of the Orient, so far from being slaves, actually enjoy many of the rights which their Occidental sisters are still clamoring for. In fact, the average woman knows no more about Turkey and the Turks, nor about Oriental nations, their beliefs, laws and customs, than she has gleaned from the "Arabian Nights" she read in her fairy-tale years. As to accomplishing anything at all by means of petitions, do the club women really imagine that European sovereigns will be willing to meddle in the affairs of their neighbors on the bidding of outsiders? Is it possible that the ladies of the San Francisco smart set flatter themselves that Queen Alexandra and Queen Wilhelmina, and all the other royal folks, are going to read the signatures and remember the signers? Since they are silly enough to engage in such a project it is not unlikely that they do. But probably they don't care. They get their pictures in the local papers that use them for news-creating purposes, and that is sufficient compensation.

Returns With a New Scheme

That prince of promoters and financiers, John Addison Peralta-Reavis, is in town exuberantly boosting a gigantic scheme to irrigate the deserts of Arizona and make them to blossom like the gardens of Paradise. Peralta-Reavis never wastes his fine work on anything except it is gigantic, and this scheme is big enough to satisfy the ambition of any of the present-day giant promoters. He needs for a starter only fifteen million dollars. After that, "some additional waterways ought to be developed that will cost about ten million dollars," etc., etc. He conceived the idea of irrigating the deserts of the great Southwest over twenty years ago: the time he was laying the foundations of his great land grant claim against the government. He tried to get the capitalists who were backing him in that fight to develop first the irrigation scheme, but after a long conference they decided that there was quicker and safer money in the land claim. The long-headed Peralta-Reavis thought otherwise. To play safely he took up a number of valuable water rights on the Gila and Salt rivers. The recent action of the United States government in promoting schemes for national irrigation has greatly increased the value of these water rights. Peralta-Reavis has capitalized them, and it is this stock in which he is now trying to get capitalists interested.

Greatest Fraud of the Century

His work would be vastly easier did not the taint of the great Peralta-Reavis fraud still cling to him. It was the star fraud of the last century, and in the number of millions that might have been won with success, it completely dwarfed that famous French classic, the recent Humbert swindle. Experts figured that Reavis would have got at least two hundred million dollars in property had he succeeded. In riding over the southwest on business and listening to the tales told by ranchers, Reavis conceived the idea of bolstering up the claims of a family, the Peraltas, to some twelve million acres of land in Arizona and New Mexico. The territory claimed is now dotted with cities, towns, rich farms and various commercial enterprises. Reavis spent several years splicing, dove-tailing and "planting" evidence before he sprung his claim. He manufactured his heirs, straight back to the original grantee, Don Miguel de Peralta de la Cordova, who was supposed to have received his title from Ferdinand IV of Spain in the seventeenth century. He took births and death records from old, moth-eaten, mildewed records buried in forgotten missions and churches in Mexico, California and Spain. If the old archives did not furnish him with the names and dates he desired he didn't hesitate to enter them in the ancient tomes himself, giving the entries of course, every appearance of genuine antiquity. Then he hunted around and discovered a beautiful Mexican girl and trained her for the part he wanted her to play—the last of the Peraltas and sole heiress to the two hundred million dollar estate left by her noble ancestor, Don Miguel de Peralta de la Cordova.

Caught Local Capital In His Net

So cunningly and plausibly did Reavis manipulate his facts and fiction that he got such headlights of the law as Roscoe Conkling and Robert G. Ingersoll to champion his cause. Numbers of millionaires were won over by his airy representations and contributed large sums to the fund he raised to back his claim before the government. An accident awoke the government to the true state of affairs and an investigation was started. That was some ten years ago. It ended in a long and hard-fought contest, costing over a million dollars, and Peralta-Reavis was sentenced to pay a fine of five thousand dollars and to go to jail for two years. He was released three months short of that time and never wore the stripes. On his previous visit to this city, some twelve years ago, he interested John W. Mackay, Collis P. Huntington, Charles Crocker and other California millionaires in his land grant, and he left here with considerable money to his credit. Things are going differently with the old gentleman this time—he is sixty, though his white hair and bent figure suggest an older age. Either he does not talk so plausibly as of yore or capitalists are shy of his record. Anyhow he now talks of hastening to New York, where dwell two millionaires who put loads of faith and money into the Peralta-Reavis claim. Even in those untried days they looked with favorable eyes on the irrigation scheme, and the old gentleman is hoping they are still willing to back their faith with money.

Amedee Joullin is to return to Paris, where he spent several years of study. Charles Rollo Peters is also going abroad, but he will settle in London.

Like Magda's Father

George F. Lamson, the pioneer auctioneer, who died the other day, was often likened unto the father of Magda, Sudermann's heroine, owing to his attitude toward his daughter, Gertrude, when she went on the stage as Nance O'Neil. He was bitterly opposed to her adoption of a stage career, and for years he never spoke to her. Both his daughters drifted stageward, and it was said they inherited their dramatic talent from their mother, who, though she was never a professional actress, frequently gave evidence of the histrionic temperament. The Lamsons were at one time quite wealthy, and when Nance O'Neil was a school girl she was the object of her schoolmates' envy owing to the fact that she had a colored maid to carry her books.

A Gilbertian Mot

According to the despatches there is a lively row on in New York between Vesta Tilley and Lillian Russell. The latter appeared in men's clothes in the latest Weber-Field burlesque, wearing trousers right out loud on the stage, and Vesta Tilley discussed their misfit for one of the Sunday papers, to the great indignation of the beautiful Lillian. This reminds me of an incident of Miss Russell's London appearance in a new opera by Gilbert and Sullivan, years ago. She was then the wife of Mr. Solomon, one of her first batch of husbands. Sir Arthur Sullivan and Mr. Gilbert were at the dress rehearsal. Sir Arthur objected to the appearance of Miss Russell's extremities, and asked his associate if he could not suggest some improvement.

"Far be it from me," said Gilbert, "to pull down the pillars of Solomon's temple."

Mrs. Willie Hearst is being piloted about by her mother-in-law, and the latter's trusty lieutenant, Mrs. Kincaid. She has met some of the most prominent matrons in town and they all like her very much. She spent some time on the McCloud river and was a guest of the Charles Wheelers.

His Touching Devotion

Nothing more touching has appeared in Madame La Bavarde's society chat for a long while than the information that the Charlie Wheelers had returned from their country place on the McCloud so as to spend as much time as possible with Mrs. Hearst before her departure for the Orient. Was anything more pathetic ever penned? The relation of lawyer and client is confidential, of course, but I never heard that it was necessarily filial. However, Charley Wheeler's affection for Mrs. Hearst is almost sublime. It will no doubt be hard for him to endure the separation during the months of her absence in the Orient.

Muriel: I am always very precise about observing the proprieties. Aren't you, Phyllis?

Phyllis: Yes, indeed. Why, I wouldn't go up in an elevator without a chaperon.

Clark's Fatal Bluff

Walter Magee is praying these days to be delivered from his friends. The woman who recently brought suit against him for running into her with his automobile estimated her damages, at first, at only five hundred dollars, but his zealous friend, Charles Clark, the son of Senator Clark, called on the lady in the hospital, and after introducing himself as the multi-millionaire of Montana, said that if she instituted suit he would fight the case. The lady's quick business instinct, which approximates genius, was at once aroused. "Oh," she said, "if Mr. Magee has so much money behind him I will sue him for five thousand dollars." Magee says he will never endorse Clark for Ambassador to England.

He Beat the Steel Magnates

Charlie Clark is a very clever card player, and he has had much success in games in which the stakes ran high. He made the biggest coup at bridge whist ever known in this city. It occurred when Messrs. Gates and Drake, the Chicago steel magnates, were out here. They proposed a game of bridge at ten dollars a point, and Charlie Clark took Prescott Scott as a silent partner with the understanding that he (Clark) would pay all the losses. When the game broke up Clark had ten thousand dollars that formerly belonged to the steel magnates. Scott, however, did not share in the winnings.

Siebe's Catch

The announcement of John Siebe's engagement with Mrs. Allie Taylor caused consternation among the local beaux, and many are curious to know how the fickle grass widow was won. Among her many admirers was "Billy" McLean, who was long thought to be the favored one. Captain Sidney Cloman is another, and he is said to be in the depths of despair. Tom Pike had a crush on her for awhile, and I hear that his sister, Mrs. Fuller, was greatly worried over the affair. Mrs. Taylor's engagement ring is a beautiful diamond cluster, and her gift to Mr. Siebe is a heavy seal ring, the top of which opens, disclosing an exquisite miniature of his fiancee. The custom of giving steins to a man on his engagement is growing in favor, and Mr. Seibe has a very handsome collection which rivals that of the cups received by Mrs. Taylor. The wedding will take place the first of the year.

What a blessing it would be if we could only be inoculated against boredom and rendered immune to the deadly influence of faddists, fanatics and fools.

Married in Hermosa

The news of Charlie Bull's marriage with a pretty Hermosa girl came as a surprise to his friends. He has built a home for her at the mine, and his sister Marie is soon to visit him and pass judgment on the bride. Bull was one of the Rough Riders and he left Harvard with his friend, Stanley Hollister, to join the Roosevelt regiment. When Hollister was ill in Cuba, he was nursed by his chum. When the Rough Riders disbanded Bull returned to California, and on the death of his mother he inherited nearly one million dollars. He never cared for society, and when he was not working in the mines of Tuolumne county he spent his time at the old Bull place in Belmont, which was built by William C. Ralston. It is now a sanitarium.

Brown—Mrs. De Gaiety was never in society until after her divorce. Don't you consider it strange?

Jones—No; the co-respondent was a Duke.

Discord Rampant

Blood will tell. The old spirit of secession has broken out afresh among the Daughters of the Confederacy. The Californian Division of the Order is split wide open. The two factions headed by Mrs. Voorhies and Mrs. Van Wyck fought it out on the floor of the convention last Tuesday, and now the bloody flag is afloat, and discord is rampant. The split occurred over the election of officers. The ladies of the Sidney Johnston chapter, over which Mrs. Voorhies presides, and to which Mrs. Van Wyck formerly belonged, were in the majority and elected the officers, after which they adjourned and retired. The defeated forces remained on the field, however, rallied and reconvened, after which they resolved that the election was illegal and proceeded to ballet again. This time Mrs. Van Wyck, who appears to be the central figure in the disturbance, came out victorious. She achieved her ambition, being elected president. And she appeared to be perfectly satisfied though it was the warmed-over convention that elected her. The ladies of the other faction attribute all the troubles and dissensions in the order to the over-leaping ambition of Mrs. Van Wyck. They say that she was a disturbing element in Sidney Johnston chapter, and that she resigned when she found she couldn't run it, and thereafter gave it opposition by organizing the Jefferson Davis chapter. Altogether it is a pretty mess, and peculiarly feminine, and it will of course occupy the attention of the National Division later on.

A Naughty Bachelor's Scandalous Trick

Mrs. Van Wyck is an aggressive woman and quite a strategist, and when she starts out to accomplish anything it is no easy matter to call a halt. She has long occupied a prominent position among the Southern aristocracy of this city. Some years ago she disputed the social supremacy of Mrs. Salisbury, and she gave that energetic woman the battle of her life. By way of opposition to the Friday Fortnightly Club she organized the Thursday Night Reception Club, and gave several very successful affairs. The Van Wyck girls never attended the Friday Fortnightly socials, and the Salisbury girls shunned the Thursday Night Reception dances. Both organizations prospered until several bachelors who had enjoyed Mrs. Van Wyck's hospitality gave a cotillion to testify to their appreciation of the social favors that had been bestowed on them. Mrs. Van Wyck was consulted about the cotillion and she said that it would meet with her approval providing no wine or punch were served. This was agreed to but during the progress of the affair one of the bachelors, who considered lemonade a trifle tame, slipped out, bought a bottle of gin and surreptitiously "doctored" the unexhilarating beverage. Mrs. Van Wyck was among those who sipped the lemonade after it had been converted into a gin punch, and she retired soon afterwards. Several girls who had imbibed freely grew politely hilarious, and the affair provoked great indignation. I believe that was the end of the Thursday Night Reception Club.

The Kruttschnitts

Julius Kruttschnitt has entered his son in Yale University. Mr. Kruttschnitt is a graduate of the University of Virginia. He is a civil engineer by profession, and he first attracted the attention of Mr. Huntington when he had charge of the work of the Texas and Pacific Railroad through Louisiana and a part of Texas. He was then a resident of New Orleans, where his brother, who is one of the most popular bachelors of the city, represents the interests of the Southern Pacific Company. The father of the Kruttschnitts was German Consul in New Orleans for many years. Julius Kruttschnitt married into an old French family of the Crescent City.

The Rutherford Sisters

Emma Rutherford, whose engagement with young Kearney was announced last week, never went much in San Francisco society. When the Rutherfords were mere school girls they used to spend every summer at Del Monte where they were counted among the most daring swimmers. Alice, the elder, is fond of books, but is also quite athletic. Her sister was named after their mother. After Alexander Rutherford's widow married George Crocker, she never made any effort to storm society here, but when she decided to make New York her home she immediately laid plans for a social campaign in Gotham. She has been rather successful, too, a circumstance that appears to have made some of the less-favored San Francisco society leaders jealous. When Mrs. George was last out here she was not rushed by society, though there is no reason why she should not have been. She is of an excellent family, the Hanchetts of Sacramento, and she was prominent in local culture club life before she went to New York.

The Eccentric Burgess

The latest story illustrative of the eccentricity of Gelett Burgess comes from the Mission. The author of the "Purple Cow" visited the home of a German physician in Valencia street some time ago to spend an evening with the daughter of the family. He was shown into the drawing-room to await the coming of the young lady, but as soon as he was left alone he set about the task of unloading a huge book-case, an old-fashioned affair with great glass doors that run almost to the ceiling, and with shelves of great depth. With surprising diligence he piled the books in a great heap on the floor. Then he lifted out the shelves themselves and squeezed himself into the case, tugging the glass doors together after him. It was in this unique and rather startling attitude that he was discovered by the young lady when she entered the room. She gazed in dumb astonishment upon the mountain of books on the floor, the pile of shelves, and the man behind the glass panes. It was but natural that she should request some explanation for this extraordinary conduct, but the reply she received was even more bewildering, for her guest stepped from his odd retreat and essayed to place her within the bookcase. The most sincere importuning of Burgess failed to impress her with anything but the fact that her caller might possibly be out of his mind. She assumed a freezing manner and requested him to restore the shelves and the books with all possible speed. This was done, and the call was cut short.

Judge "Wardie" McAllister was the victim recently of a peculiar accident that laid him up with a lame leg. He happened to be in the way of a box carelessly hurled from a downtown wholesale house, and the projectile hit him in the leg.

Margaret Cameron Re-marries

Cards have been received announcing the marriage, in New York in September, of Margaret Cameron, the writer, and Harrison Cass Lewis, a business man of New York and Chicago. Mrs. Lewis was formerly the wife of Benjamin Smith, a prominent insurance man of this city, but the Smiths tried to live with all their relatives and the presence of two mothers-in-law and a few other relatives in the same house led to the usual result. The surprise to their friends was that the marriage lasted as long as it did. The Smiths seemed fond of each other, but Mr. Smith also revered his next of kin to the extent, since they were rigidly temperate, of keeping a bottle of Scotch at a neighbor's house. Margaret Cameron Smith was not the woman to endure such casuistries and the result was an explosion which blew the Smiths far apart.

True to His First Love

Mr. Lewis is a childhood friend of the writer and the marriage is a termination of a boy and girl affair which began years ago, but was interrupted by the removal of the heroine to California. Mr. Lewis never married, and when he met his lady love again after her separation from Mr. Smith, he found her as charming as ever. The loss of Margaret Cameron is a serious one to the literary world of California, and to the Spinners' Club, and to the Piedmont colony of litterateurs in which, by virtue of her wit and conversational gifts, she occupied the foremost place. Like Kate Douglas Wiggin, Margaret Cameron talks even better than she writes. She is also a fine musician. There is not the slightest hope that she will ever return to California, New York offering so much wider and more attractive a field for her efforts. Mark my words, she will establish a New York literary salon.

Look Up the Old Album

Apropos of this marriage, I hear that Oakland girls are rooting out old photographs taken in their childhood, tintypes in which little boy playmates posed with them and that sort of thing. The story goes that Harrison Lewis and Margaret Cameron had such a picture taken together when they were infants in short skirts and knickers, and that it was the discovery of the photograph among his souvenirs that brought his present wife's image again to mind. A portrait, by the way, has played a part in another Oakland romance. George Doubleday, the New Yorker who married Alice Moffitt, fell in love with her a long time before he made her acquaintance. He saw a picture of her in a group of Oakland society girls who acted as bridesmaids at a wedding. The face took his fancy and when he came West not long after, one of his first moves was to seek an introduction to the portrait's subject.

Mrs. Colton Ill

Mrs. David D. Colton is so seriously ill that it is thought she will not live any length of time. She has Bright's disease, which is now at the acute stage. Mrs. Colton will come to California for the winter, and Mrs. McLean Martin will accompany her. Mrs. Colton, by the way, has plenty of money to smooth the hard path of a sick woman. She is a shrewd financier and in spite of the reverses of one season of her life she is now a rich woman. I am told that her fortune amounts to a million. Her only heirs are Mrs. Martin and Mrs. Schacher of Paris, the daughter of the late Mrs. Crittenden Thornton.

The marriage of Miss Mary Nichols, daughter of Bishop Nichols, and Mr. Lansdale, is one of the social events fixed for the early winter.

The Floods at Menlo

Though Miss Jennie Flood claims she is too poor to live in big houses, her brother Jim and his wife are not worried over their financial status. They are delighted that the Menlo Park place is to be theirs and intend reviving its glories as in the days when the Flood gold dinner service was famous. Mrs. Flood senior was fond of dispensing large hospitality, and she believed in spending money, too, on clothes and jewels. I remember one time she was going down to Menlo and carried her jewels wrapped in a handkerchief. She lost them on the train, but by a piece of rare good luck they were recovered.

Mrs. Hermann Oelrichs is expected to arrive in San Francisco about the seventeenth, to attend to certain business matters.

The Cuttings Are Coming

Lady Sibyl Cutting and her husband, Mr. Bayard Cutting, are going to spend the winter in California. They were here about two years ago, shortly after their marriage, and paid a flying trip to their beet sugar place in the South. The Cuttings' match was a novelty in international unions, the title being on the lady's side. Mr. Cutting was an American Legation attache and Lady Sybil Cuffe a beauty who thought love counted for more than mere rank. She is not a tremendous beauty, it was discovered when she visited California, but her simple, unpretentious manner charmed everybody.

Mrs. Marion de Vries left for Washington, D. C., last Thursday, after a short visit in San Francisco. Mrs. de Vries, who was Miss Snead of Sacramento, is a beautiful woman, a tall brunette with a svelte figure, and she dresses in exquisite taste.

The Alden Club's "Household Shower"

The Alden Club is always doing something unusual. Its "household shower," planned for next Saturday afternoon at the Sorosis Club's rooms, will be a very original affair. The function is for the benefit of the good work carried on by the California Sunshine Society, of which the Alden is a branch. Miss Gertrude Wheeler, the contralto, Miss Lillian Quinn, Miss Jean Durell and Mr. Edward Xavier Rolker will take part in the musical program. One number of particular interest is being kept a secret until the last moment, and cannot fail to please. There will be fortune-telling, too, and other modes of amusement. The patronesses are Mesdames Merrill, Sexton, De Greayer, Jewett, Burns, Caswell, Bucknall and Ayer. Miss Jean Pedlar, the Alden's president, will be missed. She is traveling in the East.

The Guild ladies of St. Stephen's are preparing for a fair, to be given about the middle of the month. One of the features will be a "surprise package" table.

Peculiarities of the Grants

The Joe Grants may remain away a long time. Mrs. Joe Grant is always bored in San Francisco, and she prefers to live abroad. She was brought up in Europe, and thinks that life is not worth living except on the continent. She is haughtily indifferent to the society of the members of the local smart set, and though people make a great fuss over her, they weary her so that she seldom returns their calls. Her husband, on the contrary, loves to dally in the eddies of the social whirlpool. He prides himself on his familiarity with the personnel of the aristocracy of foreign capitals, and he usually sprinkles his conversations with the names of distinguished people he has met.

Lane's Rash Promises

Mr. Franklin K. Lane promised solemnly, in his Wednesday night speech, that if he be elected Mayor of San Francisco he will do the city the great honor of retaining it as his place of residence, and dying in it. He regrets that he is not a native son, but he assured his audience that he was the father of one. Those were rash promises of Mr. Lane. After one term in the Mayor's chair he would probably be sorely tempted to return to Canada, for the opportunities for blundering in the Mayor's office are more numerous than they are in the office of City and County Attorney.

Still Scoring Success Abroad

The other evening I had a chat with a woman who is just back from Germany and among other things I asked her if all the rhapsodies we hear of Ysidora Duncan's success were well founded. All true, she affirmed, and she went on to tell me that Miss Duncan's dancing is the biggest hit in Berlin and the only thing worthy of discussion in art circles. Whether it is simply the season's fad remains to be seen. At any rate the happy and lucky Californian girl is taking every advantage of it and is now on the full tide of fame and fortune in the German capital. Besides the private lessons she is giving the Emperor's children, she has been engaged by Frau Cosina Wagner and Siegfried Wagner to appear in the dances incident to the Bayreuth production of Wagner's operas. Apparently Frau Wagner, like all the rest of them, is completely captivated by the charm and the art of the Californian dancer. Later on Miss Duncan will appear in her Grecian dances in the Pantheon, at Athens. Altogether she has scored a greater hit than any Californian girl who ever went abroad to cultivate art.

A Question of Veracity

The officers of an Alameda bank are telling a story about how the institution recently lost fifty dollars, which went into the purse of a society woman of that town. One day just before train time she hurried into the bank with a check for fifty dollars. The polite teller told her that her account had been already overdrawn five dollars. "Dear me," she exclaimed, "why didn't you tell me? I must go to the city on the train and I was depending on this money." "Well, of course, I can let you have it," said the teller, "only you will have to bring it in within a few days. The directors meet soon and if the money is not paid by that time I shall have to pay it."

The lady promised to pay within the time, the teller gave her the money and she departed. Several days elapsed, and the money was not returned. One day the teller met the lady and reminded her of the money. Much to his surprise she told him that she had returned it. She said that she placed it on the counter and that he was very busy at the time. He was sure she had not. Subsequently he met her husband and told his story, but hubby had implicit confidence in his wife. The next day the bank directors met, and made good the deposit, and now the story is going the rounds.

That Berkeley Fiasco

The overweening confidence of the amateur was never so strikingly exemplified as it was by Miss Grace Llewellyn Jones when she fearlessly attempted the role of "Phedre," one of Bernhardt's greatest creations, and had the temerity to make up like the famous Mademoiselle Mere. She did not seem to realize what a tremendous thing she was undertaking but sailed blithely in, and gave a performance which was far from creditable. Why some modern French comedy was not chosen in which the amateurs need not have been put to such a severe test, and in which their work might have been enjoyable, only the elect can tell.

The Riotous Baird

Miles T. Baird, the scion of a rich family here, who trod the primrose path and at last fled the country when his riotous living made things too warm for comfort, has been reclaimed, it is said. Young Baird married Miss Ruth Jackson, a very charming girl who attended Miss West's school and was popular with the younger set. For a time all went well. The Bairds lived at the Pleasanton and were ever seen together. Then the young husband took to riotous living, fell into the clutches of a notorious woman by the name of Valencia, and was at last arrested in Ellis street. The morning of his arrest he was seen about the tenderloin in a pair of pajamas, and he even had the temerity to visit his club in that attire, being compelled to instantly resign from the same because of the incident. The lawyer who defended Baird and got him out of jail was never even thanked for his pains, and the young man left the city. His wife and baby were left to shift for themselves and it was believed that a divorce proceeding would soon close the scandal. The Valencia woman, growing bold in her achievement, telephoned Mrs. Baird from time to time until the police quietly took a hand in the affair. It was said that Miles had fled to the far east, never to return. But Miles came back. Entreaties had their effect, and he has been forgiven for the past. He is living on a ranch near Santa Rosa, but it is whispered about that his mind is a bit upset. He wandered into the city the other day and visited the club which had compelled him to resign, even signing tags there as of old, but the officers have taken steps to prevent a recurrence of the visit, and have impressed upon the young man from Santa Rosa that there is no magic whatever attached to the name "Baird."

Apropos the Morgan-Davis Marriage

Though Therese Morgan was never engaged before she agreed to become Mrs. Norris Davis, there never was a girl in society who was kept busier denying her betrothal. It was a long time before people would believe she was not going to marry Theodore Wores. When young Ben Holladay, Mrs. "Billy" Irwin's son, died, everybody expected Miss Morgan to go into mourning, for there had been such a persistent rumor of their engagement. Wednesday's bride, by the way, though she has been out quite long, is still in the early twenties. Her sister Ella is not thirty yet. One can never gauge correctly the ages of society girls, for some come out at seventeen and others at twenty-seven, though all rank as "buds" in their first season.

Somewhat more than the average polite interest accorded matrimonial functions is being manifested in Miss Cluff's marriage, which is scheduled for next month. The Cluffs have always entertained in a large way, so it is expected the wedding will be on the same extensive scale.

No Longer Exclusive

The aristocratic residents of Ross Valley are preparing to move. Next, some of the handsomest residences in what was once the exclusive abiding place of the elect will be offered to the highest bidder, for the polloi are threatening to swarm through that peaceful valley, and impregnate its fragrant atmosphere with the noxious exhalations peculiar to the unelect. Even now there is contamination in the breezes. The uncultured are crowding the swells. The unelect made their invidious presence felt on the occasion of the function given by the Bothins at their country place. They had planned an al fresco nocturnal affair. The grounds were beautifully lighted, and it was a propitious night, but before the function was half over the guests had to take to the seclusion of the Bothin roof-tree.

The Guests Fled

Surrounding the Bothin place is a low stone wall. Shortly after the festivities were started that wall was alive with spectators. They looked like gargoyles in the dim light, silhouetted against the cloudless sky. Though they had not been invited to the function they took as much interest in it as any of the guests. At first the society people were amused at the intrusion. They enjoyed being the objects of interest to the common herd, but presently the people on the wall became jocose, and indulged in pertinent witticisms and satirical comments. Some of them wrangled over the question as to the point at which "full dress" on a woman ceases to be full. They sought to illustrate by citing cases in point and the personalities aroused indignation. Some of the feminine guests withdrew and it was finally deemed expedient to abandon the gardens.

The Nuttalls in Mexico

Miss Nadine Nuttall is being much entertained by the hospitable Four Hundred of the City of Mexico. She is quite a favorite, I hear, with the diplomatic set, and an attache of the British Embassy has developed a marked crush in her direction. Mrs. Zelia Nuttall, Nadine's mother, has taken a house in the suburbs, where she entertains frequently and brilliantly. She goes every now and then on long trips to the ruins of Mitla, in her assiduous search for light on Aztec customs. Mrs. J. R. K. Nuttall expects to visit Mexico later on.

A Naval Barrister

The Hall of Justice presented the unique scene, one day last week, of an officer of the Navy enacting the role of a police court lawyer. I have been quite impressed at times with the performances of the naval barristers of the Judge-Advocate-General's office and of sundry courts-martial, but I had conflicting emotions when I learned of Lieutenant Thomas L. Stitt, U. S. Navy, entering the police court coterie. He defended a blue-jacket from the cruiser Boston, who was charged with battery upon one Lillie Smith, a denizen of lower Stockton street, but his client was mulcted in the sum of thirty dollars by Judge Fritz—a verdict which, no doubt, made the nautical attorney feel something like one per cent of that amount.

Our Lackadaisical Military Men

There is a degree of rawness often exhibited by both the officers and men of our suddenly expanded regular army, which tends to make the seasoned military man gasp for breath. I was walking down Market street the other day behind three spick and span young officers, one of whom, I noticed, wore the collar insignia of the Seventh Infantry, another those of the Tenth. Near Kearny street they met, face to face, a party of half a dozen enlisted men. Exactly one of the latter saluted the officers, and his salute was not returned. I venture to say that there is not an army in the world, even among the semi-civilized nations, where the disciplinary punctilios are so frequently ignored. The United States Army of the present day, in spite of its many virtues, is singularly lacking in military style, yet observance of the requirements of military style is a recognized criterion of discipline. Parades, reviews, guard mounting, salutes, and the other varied ceremonies all have their reasons for being, and, instead of being mere pretty spectacles, have their practical use as cultivators of the martial spirit.

Moale's Sad Plight

One of the saddest bits of service news that has reached me for some time was that of the dementia of Lieutenant Edward Moale, of the Navy. Of high ability professionally, there is no more popular officer in the Navy than "Bessie" Moale, and his mental collapse has grieved a host of friends. The son of a distinguished Army officer, "Bessie" Moale married one of the bright, attractive Semple girls, of Seattle, whose father was one time Governor of Washington. Their married life was happy until the present calamity, which has been attributed to the strain of long service in the tropics, Moale having made an arduous cruise in Philippine waters prior to his assignment to the Chicago, on the European station, where it was hoped his health would improve. He has been invalided home.

An Historic Warship Gone

It is not without a pang that many officers of the Navy have heard of the sale of the historic old gunboat Monocacy, on the China station. This quaint vessel's history has been a familiar one to the service. She was one of the famous iron-hulled, "double-enders," propelled by paddle-wheels, which were built during the Civil war for service in the narrow, shallow Southern rivers. At the close of that strife, her peculiar construction admirably fitted her for service in the rivers of China. There she was a cosy, comfortable old craft, and many is the "Monocacy cruiser" of the service who looks back with pleasure upon the days and nights he has spent upon her in Chinese ports. She was always a hospitable ship, and the scene of many a ward-room symposium and wassail bout in the early days, when the China station was a merry one.

When Dewey Scared the Natives

When I heard the tale of consternation which came from Sausalito the other day, where windows were shattered, women made hysterical and alarm generally created from the gun-practice with the big twelve-inch rifles of the harbor defences, I was reminded of a similar affair caused by the old frigate Pensacola, now the "gardo" at the Yerba Buena training station, when she was flagship in the Mediterranean, under the command of George Dewey. The Pensacola had just entered the somnolent port of Syra, in the Grecian Archipelago, when it suddenly dawned upon Dewey that the quarter was nearly ended and that he had not yet engaged in the regular "night quarters for action," required by the regulations. The time records made were good, but the next day there was trouble. At the earliest hour conventional, an official came off to the Pensacola with a tremendous roar. He complained that the furious firing with the big guns had spread terror and destruction in the town. Not the least of his grievances was that a number of infants had been born too soon under the stimulus of the uproar. Of course, suitable apologies were made, and the flagship's band was sent ashore to discourse sweet, soothing music in the public square, but thereafter "night quarters" were held far at sea.

The Glamour of Brass Buttons

With the departure for the South of Miss Ursula Stone, San Francisco society loses an interesting debutante. She is a granddaughter of the Rev. A. L. Stone and a niece of Mrs. L. L. Baker. I hear that the glamour of brass buttons has lured her away from home, and that is why she has postponed her debut. She will spend the winter at Fort McPherson, Georgia, with her brother, Lieutenant Charles Stone, who was once engaged to pretty Kitty Du Val, but who married a charming army girl.

A Soldier's Widow

Pretty Mrs. Howard Avery left a few days ago for New York, saying that she would never return. She is such an attractive and bewitching little widow that her friends believe that when the memory of the tragic incidents of her husband's death fade away some one else will be found to console her. It was a cruel fate that cut off the bright young life of handsome Howard Avery in its prime. He was popular in college and athletic circles as well as in the army. He married Carrie Coitt after his return from the Philippines as second lieutenant of the Fourteenth Infantry, and they were living happily at Fort Wayne, Michigan, when he was drowned in the Detroit river by the capsizing of a yacht.

Howard Avery's brother Russell died a few weeks ago, and his other brother, Frank, was drowned several years ago. The Averys have had a great deal of sorrow. Their daughter Alice married Rev. Fred Reed of Christ church, Sausalito, and he died of consumption not long after the marriage. Russell's divorce was another shock to his parents. He married a handsome Spanish girl, but his ill-treatment drove her to divorce. She decided upon a stage career later. After her ex-husband's death she sued for her share of his estate. The Averys used to live in San Francisco years ago and belonged to the old Rincon Hill and South Park set, but after they moved to Sausalito local society saw little of them.

Service Gossip

Brides at the Presidio are quite an everyday affair this season. Lieutenant B. Grubbs of the Medical Department has arrived with his bride, and Lieutenant Charles Martin's bride is expected to arrive on the Sheridan next week. Mrs. Martin was Miss Mabel Woods and the marriage was an event of a few weeks ago at Nagasaki, Japan.

Lieutenant-Colonel A. W. Vogdes, Artillery Corps, who was stationed at Alcatraz for a long term of service, and more recently at San Diego, has gone to take command at Key West, Florida. Captain David S. Stanley, who relieved Captain Amos Kimball as quartermaster at the Presidio and was stationed at that post for about six months, and later in this city as assistant to the Chief Quartermaster, will shortly go to Chicago as Depot Quartermaster and assistant to the Chief Quartermaster of the Department of the Lakes. Major William B. Rochester of the Pay Department returned last Saturday from his leave of absence. Colonel L. Lomia has arrived and taken command at Fort Baker. He brought his family with him. Colonel C. Morris, the new Presidio commander, is expected to arrive today.

Mrs. Robert B. Cunningham was compelled to defer visiting her daughter, Mrs. Percy Kessler, at Fort Flagler, as the Kesslers came to San Francisco instead. Captain Kessler has been ordered to Fort Totten, New York, but Mrs. Kessler with her little boy, "Captain Bill," will visit her mother here this winter.

A House Party

Mr. and Mrs. Lewis R. Mead entertained a house-party of fourteen at Byron Hot Springs from Friday to Monday of last week. A delightful fancy dress dinner was one of the pleasures offered the guests, who included Mr. and Mrs. George B. Sperry, Miss Elsie Sperry, Mrs. Henry Wetherbee, Mrs. W. H. Reed of Chico, Miss Agnes Buchanan, Mrs. John C. Klein, Dr. Charles V. Cross, Colonel Maddox, T. J. Barbour, E. C. Bray and Clarence Doane.

Dr. and Mrs. A. A. d'Ancona gave a box-party at the Tivoli Monday night, followed by a supper.

Only a Bluff

"I do adore a real manly man," said Edith, "don't you, Maude?"

"Yes, indeed," answered Maude, "and I am going to take you to see the charming den of a manly man, today. He's got swords and guns and fishing-rods, and trophies of the chase, and pictures of pretty actresses, and all sorts of things dear to the masculine heart."

"Is he a sportsman?" asked Edith.

"Oh, I'm sure he is, for he's always talking of the glories of the chase, and how grand it is to pursue the flying deer, and how inspiring camp life is, where one is far from human haunt, and how one feels wild to get up at dead of night and hunt wild cats and things."

"How companionable I shall find him. What did you say his name is, Maude?"

"Smith—James Llewellyn Smith."

"Is he a blond?" asked Edith excitedly, "a rather thin, short chap?"

"Yes—that's he exactly. Did you ever meet him, Edith?"

"Meet him!" cried Edith in disdain, "why, he was up at Camp Sierra with us last year. He only stayed one week. He was scared to death at sight of a horse, and the sound of a gun going off prostrated him for hours. He couldn't walk a mile without fainting. Maude, I'm afraid your sportsman's den is only a big, big bluff."

The new Orpheum in Denver, Colorado, built and managed by the Orpheum Circuit Company of San Francisco, was opened last Monday evening. The auditorium is the largest in the city, has two thousand seats, and was packed to the doors with a fashionable audience. Governor James H. Peabody and his staff occupied boxes. This makes the sixth house owned exclusively by the Orpheum Circuit Company, the others being in New Orleans, Omaha, Kansas City, Los Angeles and San Francisco.

A Popular Candidate

Henry H. Lynch, the Republican candidate for sheriff, is probably the most popular man on the ticket. He has been engaged in superintending the construction of street railroads in this city for nearly twenty years, and during that period he has employed thousands of men, with all of whom he was on the most friendly and intimate terms. It is seldom that the employer of labor wins the confidence and respect of his employes to the extent to which Henry Lynch secured that of the men who have labored under his supervision.

Casey on Franklin Kay

"That lifts a gr-reat wate off me mind," said Mr. Casey as he lowered the evening paper in which he had been absorbed.

"An' phat are ye talkin' about now?" asked Clancy.

"I have rifrince to th' bye that inshpired Franklin Kay Lane to run f'r Guv'ner."

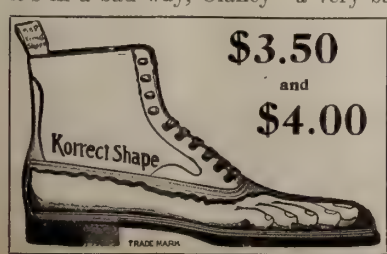
"An' phwat did a bye have to do with it?" asked Clancy.

"Everything," said Casey. "There wasn't a meetin' durin' th' whole campaign that Franklin Kay Lane didn't tell th' people that he had a broth iv a bye at home. 'I've only wan object,' he said, 'in runnin',' he said, 'f'r this job, an' that object,' said he, 'is his mother's son at home,' he said. 'I want,'' he said, 'to be Guv'ner,' he said, 'not f'r th' sthuff that's in it,' he said; 'far be it fr'm me,' he said, 'to think iv th' filthy goold. Me thoughts ar-re all iv me bye at home,' he said. 'I hope,' he said, 'to parrtissipate in th' upbuilding iv this gr-reat Shtate,' he said, 'so that,' he said, 'in afther years,' he said, 'me little bye, grown to manhood an' edjucated be th' little red schhcool house,' he said, 'will be able to point with pride,' he said, 'to the wur-ruk iv his dad,' he said."

"An' didn't they hoot him?" asked Clancy.

"Go long wid you, Clancy," exclaimed Casey in a burst of indignation. "Why, they ate in choonks. An' now I see he's goin' at it again. His persinle or-rgan, th' evening Bullitin, has an article entitled 'Franklin Lane's Boy Sidney.' That's phwat lifts th' wate off me mind. I've been dyin' to know phwat th' lad's name is. An' it's Sidney. That's a shtylish name f'r you. It'll get many a vote f'r Franklin Kay on Tehayma shtreet. It's little Sidney that's deshtined to take his shtand some day in th' dishtant fuchure, on th' white porch iv' his home, on th' top of Twin Peaks, an' pointing to th' city at his feet, exclaim, 'That's phwat me illustriyous father, Franklin Kay, did f'r his counthry.'"

"But shposin Lane isn't illected," suggested Mr. Clancy.



"Then it'll be all off with little Sidney," said Casey. "But Franklin Kay is a great campaynor, Clancy. He has a wonderful gift iv th' gab. He reminds me iv a Tipperary man I wanst knew, whose mother took a fit iv talkin' just before he was born, an' she marked him. I've suspected that Franklin Kay was marked, too. He shtarted out in life as a timp'rince talker f'r ole Vinegar Bitters McDonald, an' he's been talkin' iver since, but mostly always f'r Franklin Kay. He wouldn't talk about anybody on the ticket but himself when he was runnin' fr' Guv'ner, excipt when he talked about Sidney, an' when he axcipted th' nominashin f'r Mayor it was all 'I, meself an' I.'"

"Ar-re you goin' to vote f'r him, Casey?" asked Clancy.

"Well, I dinnaw," was the reply. "Iv he's all he ripresints himself to be I guess I'll have to. He admits himself that he's th' only honest man runnin' f'r th' job, an' he sez th' people must illect him iv they want to save th' charter. What's happinin to th' charter, says you? Well, it's in a bad way, Clancy—a very bad way. James Divval Phelan took sevril bad smashes at it while pretendin' to be friendly, an' it was very groggy when Eugene Schmitz took office. The first thing Eugene did was to take into his private office an' expose it in all its naykidniss to Abe Roof. I dinnaw just what Abe did, but I suspect that it was a criminal assault f'r th' charter has been lame iver since. An' now Lane wants to dochter it, but I'm suspicious iv him somewhat. He bungled th' bond issue two years ago, an' as City Attorney he's been writin' two opinyuns on ivry quechin. He's th' most dexteriyus man with his legal opinyuns I iver saw. But I know he wants to please people, because I was told that one iv' his opinyuns was in th' office iv a big corprashin two days before it was filed at th' City Hall, which shows that he wouldn't take an unfair advantage iv any one, not even a corprashin, an' his hatrid f'r corprashins is like that iv th' devle f'r holy wather."

"Then you think he's a great man," said Clancy.

"I have his wurrud f'r it," said Casey.

In Financial Circles

Business in the Stock and Bond Exchange since the beginning of the month has been extremely light and absolutely featureless. Transactions up to the sixth inst., inclusive, aggregated $96,000 in bonds and 1,840 shares of various stocks, divided as follows: 360 shares miscellaneous stocks; 305 shares Gas & Electric stocks; 160 shares S. V. Water Works; 80 shares S. V. Water Company; 907 shares sugar stocks; 28 shares Bank of California. The unsatisfactory condition of the Eastern markets was certainly reflected here on our market, though our financial situation is much better. The Lighting situation is unchanged. About 28,000 shares of the Pacific Gas Improvement Company have been surrendered in exchange for S. F. Gas & Electric stock, leaving about 7,000 shares to be exchanged. The stock of the Spring Valley Water Company has been listed. This is the new company which took over the Spring Valley Water Works.

THE STAGE

The Chicagoese Musical Comedy

"The Paraders" is one of those musical pieces that improve with age. Indeed the average musical piece is a bore until it has been whipped into shape, but "The Paraders" is no weakling even in infancy. It has a good healthy glow, shows signs of having been well nourished with gags, quips, and other laugh-provoking fodder, and bids fair to mature satisfactorily if properly nursed. Mr. Raymond W. Peck is no George Ade, even though he does hail from Chicago, but he knows how to gorge an audience with nonsense, and flim-flam them into the notion that a plot is thickening before their eyes, even though it is as thin as a wafer. It requires a peculiar order of intellect to write a musical comedy. A man must work himself into a mood in which stupidity appeals to him as the essence of humor. He must be in such a state of mental aberration as to be able to conjure situations so lacking in humor and so utterly foolish, that they could never have occurred to him in a lucid interval. Perhaps writers of musical comedies never have a lucid interval. However, it is the very inanity of their creations that amuses the average musical comedy enthusiast. And Mr. Peck is responsible for almost as much inanity in "The Paraders" as was ever invoked by Edgar Smith in a Weberfieldian burlesque to incite an audience to laughter. His dialogue has not the scintillant sparkle which characterizes Mr. Smith's work, and it is lacking in spontaneity, but it produces laughter. The piece was written along the lines of the Weberfieldian burlesques, and affords Kolb, Dill and Bernard opportunity for their grotesque comedy work. The music by Robert Hood is catchy in streaks, and there are one or two songs that are quite melodious, but the feature of the production is its spectacular splendor, which surpasses all previous efforts of the management. The personnel of the chorus has been improved so that it is more piquant than ever, and the costuming is daintier and more picturesque. The chorus is the thing nowadays, especially in the absence of a bunch of beautiful principals, and the Fischer management has awakened to that fact. The spirited work of the chorus and the many pretty pictures it presents contribute largely to the success of the production. Mr. Blake sees comparatively little of the limelight, but he figures in one pretty picture, and he has one of the catchy songs. Maud Amber has the prettiest song of the piece, "My Alameda Rose," and Flossie Hope and Gertie Emerson get their share of the applause in the "Lisping Liz" song and dance. Incidentally, it should be stated that the dancing girls have not yet matched their hose. One is wearing silk and the other cotton.

ROBERT EDESON

Mr. Edeson is the star of the company which is to produce Richard Harding Davis's comedy, "Soldiers of Fortune," at the Columbia, a week from next Monday night.

The smart woman's favorite cocktail has Chapin & Gore whisky as its main ingredient.

Delightful "Boheme"

The Tivoli presented a gala spectacle Monday night when the old favorite, "Boheme," was put on for the first time this season. It was the best-dressed audience that has been seen in the house for a long time. There were silks, satins and diamonds galore, and the scene was faintly reminiscent of a Grau first night. Tina de Spada made her first appearance as Mimi, and though she sang and acted the role charmingly, she did not invest the character with the same delicate pathos, the subtle fascination that characterized the performance of Montanari. We have seen Montanari as Murger's heroine so often that the name of Mimi is identified with the first soprano we ever saw in the role. The Puccini opera would lose half its charm to those who have seen Montanari as Mimi and Agostini as Rudolpho, if both were absent from the cast, and even without the former the performance is not satisfactory. Will there ever be another Rudolpho like Agostini? Could any other tenor invest the role with the same poetic charm which it has in the hands of this Italian, whose individuality is merged into that of the poor, devil-may-care artist of the Latin Quarter? His voice on Monday night was as spontaneously fresh as it ever was, and the old Tivoli shook with the enthusiasm of the large audience whenever he finished a solo. Tromben made a bewitching Musettta, although she sacrificed the music allotted to the part in the endeavor to accentuate the mad-cap side of the character.

PHILIP H. RYLEY

Mr. Ryley is the very comical Tweedlepunch of "Florodora." He is busily engaged, when not amusing the public, in writing the book of a new musical comedy for which Jos. E. Nicol will furnish the music. Mr. Ryley, although a comparatively young man, has been a successful exponent of straight comedy, burlesque, extravaganza, pantomime and almost every one of the lighter forms of amusement.

'Under Two Flags" a Winner

When the Belasco version of "Under Two Flags" was produced here, there were a good many criticisms passed upon it. The chief of these was that it was not Ouida's "Under Two Flags." Belasco, that clever playwright, with his tender regard for the public morals, turned Cigarette into quite a different person from Cigarette of the novel. The Belasco Cigarette was unconventional but she was not Ouida's rough little vivandiere. The Neill version of "Under Two Flags" is real Ouida, and Edythe Chapman has never been seen here in a role so suited to her as Cigarette. Except in the equestrian scene, she gives a far more convincing idea of the Ouida character than Blanche Bates did. The latter's Cigarette was less Cigarette than Blanche Bates. But the mad ride in the storm—no one can ever approach Blanche Bates in that. Miss Chapman doesn't try, and the enthusiasm that might have gone to her equestrianism is lavished on the scenic effects. Mr. Neill is much at home in the part of Bertie Cecil, that dear idol of the school girl of fifteen or twenty years ago. The other members of the company fill their roles acceptably. "Under Two Flags" is decidedly one of the best things the Neills have ever given San Francisco.

A fire scene not set down in the manuscript was nearly a feature of "Under Two Flags" on Tuesday night. It was in that part of the play where a lamp is thrown over. But the light, instead of going out, flickered and wavered. In a few seconds, the oil would have been reached by the flame. An explosion was imminent, but none of those on the stage happened to be looking in the lamp's direction. Nervous ones in the audience began to squirm in their seats, when suddenly a hand from the wings reached out and grasped the lamp. The danger was over.

KATHERINE FISK

The famous contralto who will be one of the soloists at the symphony concerts given by Duss and the New York Metropolitan Opera House orchestra at the Alhambra theatre, the latter part of the month.

Marie Stewart Scores

When Miss Elfie Fay was at the Orpheum a short time ago, I regarded her as the "limit" in her line of work, but after seeing Marie Stewart the other night, at the same theatre, I realized that the "crazy soubrette" has a very talented rival. Miss Stewart appears in a sketch called "Paris," and she does not have the same opportunity as Miss Fay enjoyed in the stage centre, for there are other characters in the piece, but she is a comical host in herself. The bill on the whole is a vast improvement over that of last week, and one of its most popular features is Mr. Arthur Cunningham, the baritone, who recently scored a great hit in "The Highwayman" at the Tivoli. He sings several ballads, and his resonant baritone rouses the greatest enthusiasm.

They'll Open with Pinero

"Lady Bountiful," which introduces the new Alcazar stock company, ought to be interesting. It is by Pinero, and, wonder of wonders, it is said to be as pure as the perfumed breezes that sigh through the pine-clad summits of our own Sierras. Pinero is a little, dark, cynical Englishman who delights in writing dark, cynical plays. In "The Second Mrs. Tanqueray" and "The Gay Lord Quex," he has treated sex problems with the frankness of an expert gynecologist, holding a clinical exposition. In "Letty," just produced in London, he has extremely irritated the English aristocracy by sharply pointing the moral that they eat too much. "Lady Bountiful" is a love story pure and simple, honeycombed with quaint humor, with a death scene as tear-compelling as that of the hectic hued "Camille." But, as the author declares in a prefatory rhyme, there is—

"No war, no lust, not a commandment broke
By sir or madam—but a history
To make a rhyme to speed a young maid's hour."

Alcazar players come and go, but interest is keyed up to unusual pitch by the advent of the late newcomers, and general manager E. D. Price, who went to New York last June to engage them, will be spitted upon the sharp spike of nervous uncertainty until they have passed the first night's ordeal. But Miss Block, Mr. Durkin, Miss Starr and Mr. Maher come with excellent records of achievement elsewhere, and will find cordial and impartial welcome. Miss Block, however, who has played leads in New York productions with E. H. Sothern and Henrietta Crosman, and as the serpentine and seductive Iras in the original "Ben

BOTHWELL BROWNE

Hur," confesses to a trepidation that she never felt elsewhere. It is a bit of unwritten history that the day after she signed with the Alcazar, she was invited to re-engage with Miss Crosman, and David Belasco sent for her to talk business.

L. R. Stockwell's starring engagement at the Central is proving a great financial success for the theatre, which is crowded at every performance. "My Friend from India," the Du Souchet farce, is no novelty to San Francisco, but Stockwell as Augustus Keen Shaver infuses new vim into this amusing character. The Central stock lends excellent support, as it usually does. The company is certainly deserving of approbation for the ease with which it slips from blood-curdling melodrama to a comedy such as this. After "A Midnight Bell" there will be another jump from farce-comedy to comedy drama, "Ranch 10" being the attraction announced to follow the Hoyt play.

The Third "Florodora" Company

"Florodora" is one of the musical comedies that will live, and of which we may expect periodical revivals. We may boast that our universities surpass those of England, and that we have proved our superiority over the Britishers in many spheres of activity, but we have not yet attained

The sextette of this season's Florodora company is characterized by extreme loveliness. It seems almost unfair to publish the picture of one of the "pretty maidens" when the other five are equally an ocular delight, but space forbids that all of their respective physiognomies should grace this page, and our composite photographer is on his vacation. The face above is that of Miss Mae Ellwood, whose lithe proportions and languorous demeanor are thoroughly representative of the world-famed Florodora girl. Since hers is the picture, we will let her speak for the entire sextette. She likes San Francisco—an unusual and original confession for an actress, by the way. She is delighted with the climate, the scenery, the habitues of the front row and, above all, our wines. She has met many hospitable people since her arrival, and naturally she sampled our wines. She says that she was especially pleased with Ayala. Far be it for Town Talk to criticise the young lady unduly, but her reputation as a connoisseur must suffer seriously from the fact that Ayala, instead of being a native wine, is an imported French Champagne. However, perhaps the young lady didn't think it was, and maybe after all this is merely a yarn of Ralph Pincus, the Columbia's promoter of publicity, remodeled. Who knows?

to their degree of proficiency in the art of playwrighting. And especially to the writers of musical comedies must the American doff his sombrero. "Florodora" is one of many successful musical pieces that have come from the other side of the water, and that combine a sparkling book abounding in dainty lyrics, and a melodious score replete with delicious measures. The company now appearing at the Columbia in this popular, jingling comedy is the third that has visited this city, and it gives a performance fully as satisfactory as those of its predecessors. It is short of vocalists but it has many pretty women, beautifully gowned. Miss Rush is a dainty Lady Holyrood, and Robert Graham is the best Gilfain we have seen.

"We Are Six"

The "original Florodora sextette" will probably be a standing joke long after the opera itself goes out of favor. In these clever verses the story of the multiplicity of the original sextette girls is told:

"I asked a little chorus maid,
All frills and winks and kicks:
Pray are there any more like you?"
She answered, "We are six."

"Nineteen are in the 'Silver Shoe,'
Twelve in the 'Jersey Rose,'
And thirty in the 'Runabouts'
Disport in gorgeous clothes."

The 'Prince of Kensico' has eight
At Daly's there are three;
And other theatres in town
Have fifty-six," quoth she.

"Ah, prithee, tell me true," I cried,
"And play me no rude tricks,
How many maids are there in all?"
She answered: "There are six.

"Nineteen won wealth down Wall street way,
And twenty-two are wed;
In Paris there are thirteen more,
And some, alas! are dead."

"How many are there, then," I asked,
"On either side of Styx?"
And still the simple sextette maid
Insisted, "We are six."

A few months ago one of the dailies published a picture of Miss Mildred Kearney, and announced that the was going East to win fame and fortune on the operatic stage. From what was said of her one might judge that she was a distinguished vocalist who had only to be heard in New York to be sought after by all the leading managers. It is that sort of fatuous puffery which incites young women devoid of talent to adopt a stage career. I like to keep track of them in order to blazon their triumphs. Miss Kearney is now playing a thinking part in a comic opera called "Winsome Winnie," which was produced last week in Baltimore.

There is talk of proposing John Drew for membership in the Union Club of New York, but it is doubtful whether he will be elected. There are few actors who are members of the leading clubs of New York. Lester Wallack belonged to the Union Club, but the late William Florence could not be elected there. There is no club too exclusive for Drew in this city.

The eleventh annual benefit in aid of the charity fund of San Francisco Lodge No. 21, Theatrical Mechanical Association, will take place at the Alhambra theatre, Friday afternoon, October twenty-third. The performances given to help along the good work of the "men behind the scenes" are always notable events and this year's program will be the strongest ever offered.

Ben Teal, the former San Franciscan, now stage director for Weber and Field's, was the man who staged "Ben Hur" in its Eastern productions.

The Fascination of the Unknown

To take excursions into the realm of the invisible causes of things, and to study the psychological intricacies of all that is outwardly visible, possess an indefinable charm. The strong undercurrent of this innate desire to know all that may be known of "life's secret things" is evident in the large audiences that attend the lectures given by Dr. Alexander J. McIvor-Tyndall, each Sunday evening. In his lecture on "The Elixir of Life," last Sunday night, Tyndall showed that the alchemists, who are popularly supposed to have been in league with demons, were merely scientific investigators, who probably knew of a substance corresponding to the newly found radium. The experiments that followed were made with marvelous accuracy and precision. Tomorrow night Tyndall will talk on "The Thought That Kills," giving further demonstrations of his psychic powers. "Money" will be the subject of the psychological talk on the Sunday following.

Features of Next Week's Bills

"Florodora" will have another week at the Columbia, ending Sunday night, October eighteenth. Robert Edeson in "Soldiers of Fortune" will come next.

The Neill engagement at the Grand closes after tonight's performance. Bothwell Browne's "Cleopatra Up-to-Date" will then have a week's run. The scenery and costumes will be new and beautiful. In the ballet will be introduced the smallest toe dancer in existence. Chorus features will be the symbolical ballet, "The Storm," which concludes with the pretty tableau, "Love Among the Flowers," the juvenile ragtime sextet, and the singing of the soul-stirring song, "The Way of the Cross," by one hundred and fifty children, the effect of which will be enhanced by an exceedingly beautiful tableau vivant. "The Christian" comes next.

"Lady Bountiful' is the selection for the opening of the new Alcazar stock company. John Hare starred in it when it was originally played at his own London theatre, and Georgia Cayvan, Effie Shannon and Herbert Kelcey shared its honors at the New York Lyceum, but it has never been seen here. In the church wedding scene, the choir boys of St. Luke's will sing. The play to follow will be Clyde Fitch's "The Cowboy and the Lady."

"The Paraders" will crowd Fischer's all next week.

The Tivoli will have "Mignon" and "Cavalleria" with "Pagliacci" as its alternating bills next week. Marchesini will sing the title role in "Mignon," Tromben will be Felina; Tedeschi, Wilhelm; Travallini, Lothario; and Eugenie Barker, Frederick. Benedetto will be Santuzza in "Cavalleria," Miss Barker will be Lola, and Agostini Turridu, with Zanini as Alfio. De Spada will be Neddo in the Leoncavallo opera, Ischierdo will be Canio, Gregoretti, Tonio, and Cortesi, Peppe.

Hoyt's masterpiece, "A Midnight Bell," will crowd the Central. The comedy was produced for the first time at the Alcazar when Mr. Stockwell created the role of Deacon Tidd. Since that time there have been many Deacon Tidds, but they have all suffered in comparison with Stockwell's inimitable impersonation, the part of the Deacon fitting him like a glove. Mayall will have the part of Lawyer Keene, in which Joe Grismer originally appeared; Shumer is cast for Labaree, the bank cashier and heavy villain of the piece; Miss Lawton will be Norah, the school teacher, first played by Phoebe Davies; and Myrtle Vane, the pretty soubrette role of Dot, the parson's daughter.

Colombino, who plays a whole farce by himself, impersonating six different characters, will make his first appearance in this city at the Orpheum; in addition, he presents caricatures of Wagner, Bizet, Rossini, Gounod, Mascagni and Strauss. The sisters Rappo, Russian, Siberian, Tscherkess and Cossack dancers, from Irkutsk, return after a long absence, and the three Crane brothers will be seen in "The Mudtown Minstrels," a burlesque on a conventional minstrel first part. Wallace Brownlow, the distinguished English baritone, will be heard for the first time in America. He has just arrived from the Antipodes. His opening selections will be "When Bright Eyes Glance," by Hedgecock, and "Doreen," by Allon. A. P. Rostow, the Russian equilibrist, will be new. Juliet Wood and Fred Ray will return for a week.

At the Chutes the newcomers will be Trask and Rogers, who have been with the best minstrel organizations in the country, in their original singing and dancing comedy act, John Tierney, who calls himself "a modern Irishman" and who comes direct from New York, Allen Wightman, a clay modeler and pastel painter, and Josie Ainsley, contralto. The "Penny Arcade" is the latest novelty at the Chutes —The Playgoer.

Just How Far?

Note.—The latest song hit in the East is "There's Everything in Knowing Just How Far a Girl Should Go."

It's pretty hard to tell what a new-century girl should do. When, for instance:

A clubman tells you a story, a bit risque, and the point of which is in French but perfectly plain to you—ought one to laugh, blush or frown?

If the first, he may think you too sophisticated; if the second, that you are feigning innocence; if the third, that you are a prude. In any case, he may never tell you another, and then how would you manage to get a repertory for dove luncheons?

If a man steals a kiss in the conservatory, after a waltz and a glass of champagne have had their mellowing effects, what ought one to do?

If you are angry, he will laugh and try it again. If you repulse him, he will think you are pining to have him repeat the offense.

If you return the salute, in fun, he will think your kisses are given to every Tom, Dick and Harry. 'Tis very hard to know just how far a girl should go.

If a man has given you every reason to believe he adores you, showered gifts upon you, and called frequently, but never asked you the question, how can you lead him up to it?

If you have Mamma or Papa sound him as to his intentions, he will consider you bourgeois. If you do a little dramatic business as a leader on your own account, you may scare him away. If you let him keep on coming, and conferring meaningless attentions, you may lose a better chance. What should one do?

If you have two nice men on a string, playing both with a loose line, and another man comes along who seems more promising, how can you throw him a line when each of the other fish holds the flies?

How can you disengage one of those from your only two hooks, so as to throw the line at the new fish?

If a man whom you like very much asks you to dinner, leaving the choice of floors to you, would you say first, second or third?

If the first, he will not ask you again, no doubt, but will take your dearest enemy next time. If the second, he will think you too cautious; if the third, too wise.

If the husband of your best friend invites you to an automobile spin, in his wife's absence, should you accept?

If you don't, he will think you dislike him. If you do, he will press his advantage and insist on taking you again and again. If his wife hears of it, she will hate you. If she doesn't hear of it, you will always be afraid she will. If she hears of the invitation, and that you didn't accept it, either of two things will happen. She will be offended that you couldn't trust her husband on a simple automobile spin, or else she will think you refused for a blind. In any case, you will be under suspicion.

In society, if you laugh frequently, they say you have had too much champagne. If you are witty, that you read Pinero and Wilde. If you flirt openly, they say that you are brazen; if you flirt quietly, that you would do worse things. If you are cordial, that you are diplomatic and pine for popularity. If you are reserved, that you are haughty, disagreeable and have things to conceal.

'Tis very hard to know how far a girl should go.

—The Maiden.

The Symphony Leader's Au Revoir

It was the Fritz Scheel loved of San Franciscan music lovers, the artistic leader, burning with the hard, gem-like flame, that put the fine flavor of his personality into the farewell concert of last Tuesday afternoon. For me, for Mr. Scheel also, I fancy, the real concert came to an end with the finale of Franz Schubert's beautiful symphony in C major. On ears full of Beethoven's magnificence and Schubert's wonderful melodies, Dr. Stewart's "Montezuma" and even the Liszt "Rhapsody," fell with an inappropriateness approaching dissonance. Although not characterized by any great originality, the work of our talented local composer is well orchestrated, and in the Grove, with forest setting, with Schubert in the background, very much in the background, with the ear allowed an out-of-doors latitude, must have been most effective. The judgment of the audience as a whole, that forgot for the time being Beethoven and Schubert and Fritz Scheel, and remembered only Dr. Stewart of San Francisco, was no doubt juster than that of a critic engaged in the sorry business of making odorous comparisons. The composer was called for after the second movement of the suite, the intermezzo expressing the delights of love, and again at the end of the number. He very modestly stood at one side of the stage until Scheel compelled him to take a more prominent place. The "Montezuma" music will be heard in New York when Louis Robertson finishes the revision of his music-drama for Mr. Frohman.

Mrs. Moeller's Pupil Recital

On Wednesday evening of last week Byron Mauzy hall was filled with a large and friendly audience, which applauded freely the long and interesting program offered by the pupils of Mrs. Frances Moeller. It would be impossible to give detailed criticism of the thirteen numbers, though special mention should be given to four of them. Walter M. Leitch, who sang Trotere's "The Deathless Army," gave his number in fine style; Orville D. Fairfield's rendition of Buck's "Bedouin Love Song" was worthy of all praise; Mrs. Frank Bellhouse sang "I Am Titania," from "Mignon," with much spirit, and the quartet, "Absent," by Misses Tappan and Quire, Messrs. Springer and Schuler, was admirably sung. The last was the only number, save the final one, to which an encore was permitted, no recalls being the rule. The concluding number was the sextet, "When the Golden Sun," from Francis's "Royal Rogue," and was sung in costume. The feminine singers wore cardinal costumes with parasols of the same brilliant hue, and the masculines were in army uniform. Mrs. Moeller played all the accompaniments. Mrs. Moeller, by the way, was formerly one of the prominent lights in Sacramento's musical cult. She belonged to the Saturday Club, the culture club of the Capital.

Wagner Music at Trinity

Next Wednesday evening at eight o'clock at Trinity church, Mr. Louis H. Eaton will give his eighteenth free organ recital. It will be a Wagner program and the organist will be assisted by Mr. Louis J. von der Mehden junior, 'cellist. The organ numbers will be the Preludes to "Lohengrin," "Parsifal" and "Tristan and Isolde," Introduction to the third act and Bridal Music from "Lohengrin," Romance from "Tannhauser" and the overture to "Tannhauser," the only exception to the Wagner program being Bach's Prelude in E minor. Mr. von der Mehden will play Walther's Prize Song from "The Meistersinger."

The Royal Italian Band, which Channing Ellery has devoted so many years to bringing to a remarkably high standard, will be with us again soon under the management of Will Greenbaum. The organization is stronger and better than ever and the repertoire greatly increased by the library of Signor Chiafferali, the new conductor, who is said to be the best Italian bandmaster ever brought to America.

Augusta Cottlow at Lyric Hall

The program for the opening concert at Lyric hall next Tuesday night by Augusta Cottlow is a most interesting one. Miss Cottlow will play an arrangement of one of Bach's organ preludes and fugues arranged for piano by the great master, Busoni, a Brahms Cappriccio, Chopin's Nocturne in F sharp minor, and Scherzo in C sharp minor, Tschaikowsky's Romanze Op. 5 and Etude de Concert, and Polonaise in E major by Liszt. Mr. Blumenfeld, the violinist, and Arthur Weiss, 'cellist, will play with her Rubinstein's brilliant trio in B flat major. Mr. Blumenfeld will play Brush's arrangement of the old Hebrew air, "Kol Nidrei," two movements of a Bach sonata, Vieuxtemps' Air Savoyard and Reverie and Wieniawski's Rondo Elegante, accompanied by Fred Maurer. Thursday night will be devoted entirely to a piano recital by Miss Cottlow, and she will play Beethoven's thirty-two variations in C minor, Schumann's "Papillons," Chopin's rarely played Ballade in F major, MacDowell's Polonaise in E minor, the Marche Militaire of Schubert-Taussig, and two compositions by Mr. Samuel Bollinger, now a resident of this city. On Saturday afternoon, the seventeenth, Miss Cottlow and Mr. Blumenfeld will again appear together and play Beethoven's "Kreutzer Sonata," besides brilliant solo numbers. On Friday night the two artists will appear at the Unitarian church in Oakland. After the Cottlow concerts Manager Greenbaum promises the finest orchestral concerts ever given in this city. The entire orchestra of the Metropolitan Opera House will appear in four concerts under the great Duss, with such soloists as Nathan Franko, the violinist, Katharine Fisk, the contralto, and Madame Nordica.

The Wagner Festival

The least said, from a musical point of view, of the Grand Wagner Festival given last Thursday night, the soonest mended. For the lovers of the great modern, there was little but disappointment. For those who dislike him—and there are still many—there was much to confirm their preconceived unfavorable opinion. Wagner's music, being new and not conspicuously melodious, is easily made meaningless; it requires exquisite artistry to make it the wonderful thing that at its best it really is. The Thursday night performance did neither the performers nor the great composer justice, and therefore I refrain from detailed criticism. Perhaps before going to the concert I should have sat down, read and indigested Oscar Wilde's delightful sermon on "The Decay of Lying."

The concert given by Mr. Edward Xavier Rolker's pupils was too late for review in this issue. Few teachers, by the way, have had the satisfaction that came to Mr. Rolker, when his pupil, Miss Goodwin, whose voice he developed, returned from abroad last fall to continue her work under his guidance, after months of study with Marchesi in Paris, Withrow, and later on, Korbay in London. Miss Goodwin leaves for the East to complete plans for her operatic career. Miss Gertrude Wheeler, after another year's work, will go to Europe. Her work will be concert and oratorio.

Kathleen Parlow will give a violin recital in Stockton next Tuesday evening, in connection with Miss Clara Alexander's darky dialect recital. The affair has all Stockton's society leaders as patronesses, among them Mrs. Budd, Mrs. Sperry, Mrs. Welch, Mrs. Hodgkins, Mrs. Terry and Mrs. Peters. When Miss Alexander gives her farewell recital in San Francisco next month, she will have a new baritone to assist—Willard Young. He has a magnificent voice, and is a member of two church choirs here, but this will be his debut in concert.

On Thursday evening the Photographic Salon opened at the Hopkins, a promenade concert with Henry Heyman directing the music being the charming accompaniment. The program included numbers by Komzak, Offenbach, Bizet, Strauss, Walteufel and others. A vocal and instrumental concert under Sir Henry's direction will be given next Thursday night and also on Saturday night the twenty-fourth of October.

—The Music Critic.

Oscar Wilde's "Salome" was warmly received in Berlin. It was "Salome" that came under the censor's ban when a London production was suggested.

Automobile Topics

Charles B. Shanks, of the Winton Motor Carriage Company of Cleveland, Ohio, and editor of the Auto Era, arrived in San Francisco last Friday. He came for the express purpose of arranging for the appearance of Barney Oldfield, the most daring automobile racer in the world, in this city next month, for the race meeting of the Automobile Club of California, which by the way will be held on November the sixth and seventh instead of the seventh and eighth. "Oldfield is coming" was on every automobile enthusiast's lips the last few days. With Barney in the fray there can be no doubt that the meet will be the most notable ever held in the West. Mr. Shanks arranged all the details of Oldfield's appearance, with Mr. E. P. Brinegar of the Pioneer Automobile Company and secretary of the Automobile Club of California. Mr. Shanks says that great importance is attached to Oldfield's racing. So highly was it appraised at the Empire City track meet in New York that he was given forty per cent of the gross receipts. Mr. Shanks is very enthusiastic over the outlook for the development of the automobile industry on this coast. Asked what he thought of the Ingleside race track, he said that he found that the conditions were not only as favorable as they might be, but that the surface was just as hard as any of the Eastern tracks. However, Oldfield will probably not make as good time as he does on the Empire track, for that track is a hundred feet wide on the stretch while the Ingleside track is only eighty feet. Nevertheless he thinks that Barney should be good for close to a mile a minute.

The new Garage of the Pioneer Automobile Company, at the corner of Golden Gate avenue and Octavia street, is fast nearing completion and will be ready for occupancy in the course of three or four weeks. The new home of the Pioneer Company is certainly a magnificent building. For completeness it will no doubt surpass any garage in the United States, and it is the largest in the world today.

First it is getting married in an automobile, and then it is spending your honeymoon in a horseless carriage. Mr. and Mrs. C. E. Le Baron arrived last week from Valley Ford on their honeymoon in an Oldsmobile. After spending a day visiting all the sights of this city, touring through the Presidio reservation and the Park, the Oldsmobile was driven via San Jose to Fresno.

That big motor bus that has been traveling around the streets of this city is the first auto of its kind that has ever been brought to the coast. It was received last week by the National Automobile Company from the Dailmer Company, New York. It is a thirty-two horse power, genuine Dailmer engine and is capable of carrying twenty passengers up a ten per cent grade. The vehicle has been purchased by H. E. Bothin.

One of the recent purchasers of a Cadillac machine is Dr. McCracken of Pescadero. The doctor last week purchased one of these motor vehicles, and accompanied by Mr. R. G. Emmons of the Western Automobile Company, left for Pescadero. "Though the trip was not made in record time," said Mr. Emmons, "we covered the distance in good time and very successfully. In carrying four passengers over the Grand View Trail, which is one of the hardest grades in the State, I think we were very successful, as the incline is nine miles long."

Mr. Leon Roos is one of the latest purchasers of a "White" touring car. He reports a very pleasant run last Sunday.

Last Sunday Mr. J. D. Spreckels took a party down to Menlo Park in his "White" touring car. From Menlo Park they took a long drive through the hills, making a total of nearly seventy-five miles.

LETTERS

The Book of Nature

"Johnny Jones" has profited by his course in Nature Study, and recorded his observations. His mother has revised his spelling, but the ideas and illustrations are Johnny's own. Johnny apparently does not care to enter into a controversy respecting the relative merits of Spencerian and vertical handwriting, for he confines himself to print, and limits himself to capitals even there. But he has made a neat piece of work of his note book, and the Paul Elder Company has published it in first rate style, on Japanese paper, with bright red covers. Some of Johnny's recorded opinions will hardly be improved or superseded when he has added more years and experience to his present span. He says:

"I like a cow that's gentle,
And tied with good, strong rope;
I've never seen a wild one,
And never will, I hope."

* * *

"I'm very fond of little doves,
I love to hear them coo,
It's such a peaceful kind of sound,
And sort of mournful, too."

"Beetles are such poky bugs,
They walk around so slow,
It always seems to me as if They don't know where to go."

* * *

"The things I hate the most of all
To have around. are fleas.
They jump and crawl all over you,
And bite you where they please."

"Johnny Jones" has done a more acceptable piece of work than Oliver Herford and the "Book of Nature" ought to find friends with young and old.

An Instructive Volume

We have been so deluged with historical novels and attempts to rehabilitate the past through the medium of fiction, and the majority of the essays have proved such doleful failures, that the jaded reader takes up a new addition to the long list with a mind predisposed to disappointment. With "Gorgo," however, the first page promises something far above the average historical romance, and with the five hundred and seventh page the promise reaches the final fulfillment, for Professor Charles K. Gaines has succeeded in making ancient Athens a living city, and her philosophers, soldiers and citizens something more than the half-forgotten names of a school history lesson. Professor Gaines is head of the Greek department of Laurence University, and it may be taken for granted that he is fully conversant with his subject. He has cleverly avoided the pitfalls which plentifully bestrew the path of the historical novelist, for instead of resurrecting an ancient manuscript miraculously preserved, and attempting to render the Greek language of that day into equivalent English, he lets the re-incarnated hero speak for himself in the modern tongue familiar to him. A student of the Greek class, called upon to read his portion of the daily lesson, excitedly contradicts his text book, a dissertation on the character of Theramenes, for it comes to him then that he, himself, was the Theramenes spoken of, and that in all the centuries that have intervened he has never been vindicated of an unjust charge. So, in justice to himself, he writes the story of his life, which is the story of the Peloponnesian war, and the long strife between Athens and Sparta. Theramenes begins his narrative when he, a small child of some three or four years, is snatched up hastily from his play, to flee with his father's household, from their country dwelling to the city of Athens, in order to escape from the ravaging hordes of the Spartan soldiery. He gives a spirited picture of an encounter with Cleon, the demagogue, in the market place, and of the crowded streets, the panic of the citizens, and the final immurement in their city residence. Theramenes is the only son of an aristocrat, and the description of his childhood, his school days and his military service, gives a graphic picture of the life and education of a youth of his rank. Amongst his school fellows are Critias, Thrasybulus, and others who became men of affairs later on, but they are here presented, not as philosophers, and soldiers, and statesmen in embryo, though they already display the qualities which afterward distinguish them, but very much like our own school boys, eager for the last news from the front, partisan and excitable. Socrates, Alcibiades, Lysander, Nicias and others appear, not as combinations of alphabetical symbols, but as living men, and the customs, manners, religion, superstitions of the Athenians are all set forth. Places of interest are described, plans of battle unfolded, and much else, but the author is never didactic. The reincarnated Theramenes tells his story simply, just as he would relate it to his grandchildren, and neither description nor explanation is lugged in by main force. Gorgo, from whom the story is named, is a Spartan maiden, daughter of their chief, Brasidas, and beloved of Theramenes. She furnishes a contrast to the scenes of war by land and sea, and the political intriguery in the intervals of open hostilities. One may cheerfully and confidently recommend "Gorgo" to those benighted children who spend their Saturday afternoons painfully poring over the pages of the encyclopedias and laboriously copying facts and figures to supplement their scanty school histories. It is not unlikely that Professor Gaines had them in mind in writing his romance, and if this particular period of Greek history is not made to live for them the fault is not his. [Published by Lothrop, of Boston.]

The Brief Novel

The series of "little novels" published by the Macmillan Company is provoking comment and discussion. On the one hand they are seized upon to point the moral of this age of haste, and on the other they are commended for their compactness. It appears to be lost sight of both ways, that the stories now appearing in separate book form are not new works, but those which have appeared in magazines, usually before their authors were known to fame, and some of those connoisseurs who always look at the label before they pronounce judgment have had the very stories they now praise under their eyes before without knowing that there was anything meritorious in them. As to the beauties of short novels or long, the value of a literary production, like that of anything else, from a batch of bread to a locomotive, is to be determined from some other standard than that of bulk. There are many novels which could not be condensed into twenty thousand words. On the other hand, there are a great many which would improve with every page or paragraph edited out. Authors have no right to mount the pulpit and preach at readers unless they have something worth saying. Neither have they any right to conclude that Niagara Falls, or a very ordinary sunset, are discoveries and inventions of their own, to be exploited in as many words as possible. Wordiness is the worst fault of young writers, whether they have humility enough to style themselves journalists, or whether they aspire to the production of "pure literature." Apparently they are all under the spell of the paragraphers who chronicle the rates paid to Rudyard Kipling, A. Conan Doyle and others who have long since completed their apprenticeship. If so much per word or per page, the more words the larger the checque, reason these mathematicians. It never occurs to them that a five-thousand word story padded out to five times that length has just one-fifth as good a chance of being accepted, or that the extra composition and paper necessary to print a short story extended to three volumes is just that much out of their pockets. There is no question but that today the short novel is preferred to the lengthy one, but this is so largely for the reason that much that was once necessary for the elucidation of situations is now known to every one who has a pretence of an education or a familiarity with books. No author need describe noted scenery now, because all the world has traveled, even if it has been but fireside traveling by means of pictures and narratives of others. Moralizing is not relished any more, for readers feel as competent to pass judgment on situations and the motives of characters as the authors are. They resent having their time wasted by the obvious and platitudinous, and the wise writer economizes words and lets his story tell itself. There is no question but that in the production of fiction today the short story, considered in the mass, is infinitely superior to the longer novel. That is not to say that novels should be entirely superseded by short stories, but that when a book is permitted to expand to four or five hundred pages there should be sufficient body to it to justify the length. A short story pulled out by main strength is apt to be very thin in spots. —The Bookworm.

A NEW LAW

The Board of Commissioners in Optometry according to a new law enacted by the last Legislature, has issued a Certificate to Mr. George Mayerle, the German Expert Optician at 1071 Market Street, authorizing him to practice Optometry and prescribe glasses to those having weak eyes and poor sight. Mr. George Mayerle has probably prescribed glasses to more prominent men of the world than any other optician in this country. The fact that the highest U. S. Army, Navy and Government officials and most eminent clergymen, judges and educators of California are using his glasses should be sufficient evidence of his wonderful ability to treat most complicated cases with accuracy and absolute perfection.

Commander U. S. Navy. MARE ISLAND, CAL., July 20, 1903. MR. GEORGE MAYERLE—Dear Sir: The eyeglasses you made for me are the most satisfactory pair I have had in the last thirty years. Check in payment is enclosed herewith. Very respectfully,
W. W. KIMBALL, Commander U. S. Navy.

The President of Santa Clara College. MR. GEORGE MAYERLE—Dear Sir: The glasses ordered came in good time. They are excellent and I am more than pleased with them. Yours very truly, ROBERT E. KENNA, S. J.

Office Chief of Police. It gives me much pleasure to recommend to the public, Mr. George Mayerle, of San Francisco. I have been using glasses for the past four years, and during that time have consulted several opticians, but not until I had consulted Mr. George Mayerle and had him fit glasses to my eyes did I get entire satisfaction. Respectfully, J. H. ANDERSON, Sergeant of Police.

Admiral Dewey, who used George Mayerle's glasses during the Spanish-American war, and is still using them with much satisfaction, highly recommends Mr. George Mayerle, and sends the following testimonial: MR. GEORGE MAYERLE—My Dear Sir: I am still using with much satisfaction the glasses you sent me at Manila; also the new ones suit my eyes perfectly. Yours very truly, GEORGE DEWEY.

Examination of Eyes will be made FREE OF CHARGE. Hours 9 to 12 a. m., 2 to 6 p. m., and 8 to 9 Evenings

Defendants

Action brought in the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and the Complaint filed in the office of the Clerk of said City and County of San Francisco.

The People of the State of California send Greeting to:

A. C. Freese (Administrator of the Estate of Pierre Langaron (deceased), Eleanora O Salmon, Eleanora O. Salmon (as Trustee) Louise Emile Salmon, Francis Salmon, Alfred Salmon, Eleanora Alexandrina Salmon, Joseph Reavilo, also known as Jose Raviolo, otherwise known as Jose Raviola, Jean Marcellin Pourguery, Tomas Pidello, Guillaume Pache, Jean Pache, Gaspard Sadony, Eleanora O Salmon (Executrix of the Last Will of Francis Salmon, deceased) John Doe, Richard Roe James Black, Mary Green and Mary Doe, also all other persons unknown, claiming any right, title, estate, lien or interest in the real property described in the complaint adverse to Plaintiff's ownership, or any cloud upon Plaintiff's title thereto

YOU ARE HEREBY DIRECTED to appear and answer in an action entitled as above, brought against you in the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, within ten days after the service on you of this Summons—if served within this County; or within thirty days if served elsewhere.

And you are hereby notified that, unless you appear and answer as above required, the said Plaintiff will take judgment for any money or damages demanded in the complaint, as arising upon contract or he will apply to the Court for any other relief demanded in this complaint.

That the property involved in and affected by said action is described as follows, to wit:

All that certain lot, piece or parcel of land, situate, lying and being in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, commencing at a point where the Northerly line of Union street intersects the Easterly line of Dupont street; thence running Easterly along said line of Union street Twenty-three (23) feet; thence at right angles Northerly Thirty-four (34) feet and four and one-half (4½) inches thence at right angles Westerly Twenty-three (23) feet to the said Easterly line of Dupont street, and thence Southerly and along said line of Dupont street Thirty-four (34) feet and four and one-half (4½) inches to the point of commencement.

That the object of said action is to obtain a judgment and decree of the above entitled Court adjudging and determining that the above named defendants and all other persons claiming any right, title, estate, lien or interest in the real property described in the plaintiff's complaint adverse to plaintiff's ownership or any cloud upon plaintiff's title thereto have not, and that none of them has any estate, right, title, lien or interest whatever in or to said real property, or in or to any part or parcel thereof, and that the title of plaintiff is good and valid, and that said defendants and all of said persons unknown as aforesaid be forever enjoined and debarred from asserting any claim whatever in or to said real property, or in or to any part or parcel thereof adverse to the plaintiff, and for such other, further and additional relief as to the Court may seem meet and proper in the premises, and for costs of suit.

ALFRED H. COATES, Plaintiff, vs. EMMA C. COATES, Defendant.

Action brought in the Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and the Complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said Superior Court.

The People of the State of California send Greeting to:

EMMA C. COATES Defendant.

YOU ARE HEREBY REQUIRED to appear in an action brought against you by the above-named Plaintiff in the Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and to answer the Complaint filed therein within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this Summons, if served within this County; or if served elsewhere, within thirty days.

The said action is brought to obtain a judgment and decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony now existing between plaintiff and defendant, upon the ground of defendant's willful desertion of said plaintiff for more than one year prior to the commencement of this action and upon the ground of defendant's extreme cruelty to plaintiff as appears from the complaint on file herein to which special reference is hereby made; also for general relief, as will more fully appear in the Complaint on file, to which special reference is hereby made.

All of which will more fully appear in the Complaint on file herein to which you are hereby referred.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said Complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief therein demanded.

The Great Avenger

Once upon a time there lived a Woman who had a Great Heart. Her Eyes being opened to the Wicked Way in which her Sex had been debased by Cruel Man, she determined to avenge the Poor Things.

"Men break hearts like Eggshells," she said to herself. "I shall make it my Especial Duty to smash as many of theirs as I can."

As she was a Fascinating Woman, she found little Difficulty in pursuing her Plan. She was Beautiful, and her beauty brought Sensuous Men to her feet. She was Clever, and therefore attracted Fools. She was Charming and Tactful, and scored with the Johnnies.

She became known as the Queen of Hearts. But she was a cold Coquette, and she soon fulfilled her intention of breaking men's Hearts.

Proud of her Triumph, she looked for the Applause and Gratitude of the Other Women, whose cause she had espoused and the Battle for Whose Rights she was Waging.

"See what I have done," she cried. "These men who broke your Hearts I have reduced to Despair."

But the Other Women refused to be Grateful. They called the Queen of Hearts a Mean, Nasty, Cruel Thing for treating the Poor Men so.

"What if he did Betray me?" said one woman. "He loved me, and maybe I could have won him back some time."

"What if he did jilt me at the altar?" said another. "There's no reason why you should treat him as if he were Dirt."

"If he were good enough to win my love," said another, "he's too good to be thrown down by You."

Then the Queen of Hearts turned from the Women of Society to the Sisters of the Midnight Hour.

"Here, surely, I will be Appreciated," she said, "for these poor things I have truly avenged."

But the Sisters turned from her. They said she had retained her virtue because she was Passionless, and, besides, they had no desire to be avenged.

Thereupon the Queen of Hearts lost her Temper. It enraged her to be told that She was Passionless. She maintained that she was naturally of an Amorous nature, but that she had control of her Feelings.

The Women of the Midnight Hour laughed at her. They said they Knew better; that she Flattered herself; that she was as Cold as an Iceberg; that she should be Pitied, nature having been so Unkind to her.

To prove them Wrong she decided to Marry, but she had Turned Down so many men that her reputation for Coldness had spread, and Nobody worth having would take a Chance. She finally married an Emaciated little Chap, and as a consequence she soon Concluded that the Women of the Midnight Hour had sized her up Aright.

The Moral of this Tale is that you shouldn't Concern yourself about Other People's Troubles until you have Lived and reached the Age at which membership in a Woman's Club affords you Opportunities for working off your surplus energy. —The Fabler.

Mr. Smart: Why are you so happy tonight?

Mr. S.: Anything amusing in that?

Mrs. S.: Not exactly. But I had the pleasure of telling Mrs. Swell this morning that her skirt gaped in the back—and she had already walked several blocks in the shopping district with it that way.

The City Vindicated

Is no significance to be attached to the defeat of the proposition to issue bonds for the purpose of equipping and operating a street railroad in this city? That was the pet proposition of all the reformers, cranks, faddists and socialists in San Francisco. It was most warmly advocated by the newspapers which are urging the election of Franklin K. Lane, who is one of the leading representatives of the dissatisfied element of the community. Mr. Lane himself was heartily in favor of the proposition, or at least he pretended to be, though it was most likely in the spirit of demagogism that he so loudly proclaimed the expediency of government ownership. For weeks and months the advocates of the proposition have been beating drums and shouting through megaphones to arouse public interest in the election, and yet only about one-fourth of the registered vote was cast. The presumption is that those who did not go to the polls were not in favor of the city's owning a street railroad. If they were their interest would have been aroused by the clamors of the people whose sentiments coincide with their own, and they would have voted. The revolutionist is always aggressive. No doubt there were many people who were inclined to favor an experiment in government ownership, but who were deterred from voting owing to the conspicuous cranks, demagogues and calamity howlers who dominated the meetings at which the proposition was advocated. Many a sane man would have hesitated to confess himself in sympathy with the people who were red-eyed in their enthusiasm over the prospect of making a street railroad part of the political system of this city. The election was a vindication of the spirit that dominates this community. Ever since the election of Eugene Schmitz, a fiddler and a professional agitator, to the Mayoralty of San Francisco, this city has been viewed with distrust in financial circles all over the world. People in the East are wondering whether San Francisco is in the grip of the crank element. They would have been convinced that it was if the bond proposition had carried.

Are They Friendly?

Ostensibly the Examiner and Bulletin are booming Mr. Franklin K. Lane for Mayor, but if they are really friendly with him it behooves him to counsel a change in their tactics. Both papers are recommending him to the favorable consideration of the voters on account of his valuable services rendered in connection with the framing of the Charter, and at the same time they are warning the people that the Charter gives the city no protection from corruption. It is true that Mr. Lane was associated with Mr. Phelan and the other pseudo reformers of the Democratic machine in the framing of the Charter, and it is also true that their main object in formulating an organic law for the city was to facilitate the building up of a powerful machine for political purposes. But this is no time for Mr. Lane's friends to remind the people of his connection with that coterie of hypocritical statesmen. In his campaign speeches, the Democratic candidate unmercifully scores the Charter which he had a hand in framing, but he courteously refrains from confessing his responsibility. But in nearly every issue the Examiner and Bulletin expose Mr. Lane's culpability, but they do so with an air of innocence that is almost sublime. This is what Mr. Lane said at a recent campaign meeting:

> I want to say to you, my friends, that the Charter of the city and county of San Francisco will prove the greatest curse that has ever fallen upon this city unless there is manhood enough in you, unless there is strength of character enough in you, unless you are keen enough of insight to realize that now is the time when the city of San Francisco must be saved. There is a possibility within that Charter of building up the greatest corrupt political machine that has ever been offered to the people of this or of any other city.

Obviously, if the Examiner and Bulletin were sincere in their professions of friendship they would keep dark the fact that Mr. Lane was largely responsible for inflicting this city with a Charter surcharged with dire calamity.

A Clear-cut Issue

As the campaign progresses dispassionate onlookers are becoming more and more convinced that this is a fight of the conservative, level-headed men of all parties against the professional agitators, the fake reformers and the promoters of industrial turbulence. Fortunately the issue is pretty clearly defined, and it is also fortunate that the element whose defeat is devoutly to be wished is uncertain as to whom it should support. Mayor Schmitz and Franklin K. Lane are appealing for support to the same element in the community. Both have equal claims upon the suffrages of that element. Mr. Lane has sought to be all things to all men, and in his artful way he has played the demagogue and the high-minded citizen simultaneously, but his hypocrisy has not been so ingenious as he imagines. He has too closely identified himself with the fake reformers and the professional agitators to seriously entertain the hope of hoodwinking the respectable voters. He was groomed for this campaign before the primaries, when there was a prospect of Michael Casey's capturing the Labor Party machine, the program being to nominate a fusion ticket with Franklin K. Lane as its standard-bearer. Then he would not have dissembled. He would have scorned to appeal to the conservatives, and to the men who have suffered from constant industrial disturbances. But Mayor Schmitz upset the plans of Mr. Lane and his political associates, and thereupon the City Attorney experienced a frigidity in the extremities that impelled him to withdraw from the contest, but as he could not do so gracefully, and as Mr. Hearst and Mr. Phelan promised to spend a lot of money to elect him, he was prevailed upon to run. Such is the history of this campaign up to date, so far as Mr. Lane's candidacy is concerned. He will not lose any money by being defeated. And surely, in view of the issue and the interests involved, there is no likelihood of the election of either Schmitz or Lane. Opposed to them is a gentleman who enjoys the confidence of the decent element of this community. Mr. Crocker is not a professional politician. No man or paper has ever intimated that he was actuated by dishonest motives, or that he would be subject to the dictation of any boss or bosses if elected. He is a man imbued with civic pride, intent upon identifying himself with the development of this metropolis, and if elected he would undoubtedly give the people an honest administration.

The Booming of Books

The Higher Journalist of Harper's Weekly, who, by the way, is W. D. Howells, discusses in the current number that bit of trickery by which new books are boosted through the offices of authors of established reputation, who are enlisted to help on the advertising by means of advance copies. The Higher Journalist deprecates the custom and scourges publishers and writers who solicit good words, but he might better direct his attention to those Higher Journalists, authors, clergymen, lawyers and other professional men who respond to solicitations, and write pages of fulsome flattery to silly society women who can help their wives and daughters to climb, or whose husbands can throw business or political advantages their way. From the amount of this extra-professional reviewing that is done, and the space that is accorded to it in daily papers, weekly periodicals, and frequently in monthly publications, there is justification for the belief that practically the whole edition of some books is sent about to those whose sole claim of capacity to judge literature lies in their more or less prominence in some other profession. The more insignificant and worthless the book, the more certain it is to find endorsement from Rev. This and Judge That, who often admit privately that they were caught and could not refuse. Reviewers who are regularly employed are often incompetent and ignorant, but they seldom deliberately falsify. The theory in America appears to be that any one who can read can write reviews, so the book department is too often put into the hands of the editor's wife or little sister or daughter just out of school. Having no basis of comparison with the literature of other lands, and knowing nothing of their own beyond the best sellers of the last year or so, and the few masterpieces which they have read under compulsion as part of their course in literature, they naturally find everything that is new to them in plot perfectly wonderful, but at least they are honest about it. Any reader of book-news quickly detects the tyro. But when men of standing in pulpit or bar are willing to sign their effusions, the first impulse is to give weight to their utterances and to buy the book on the strength of their endorsement. The second impulse, which comes after good coin of the realm has been squandered, is to recall the remark of the Psalmist concerning the veracity of mankind and to wonder how many dinner invitations have been squared.

Why Girls Go to College

"The generally accepted idea," says Caroline Halstead, "that college girls spend most of their time in profoundly scholastic pursuits, would be dispelled if occasionally a glimpse could be caught of the gay doings continually going on within the classic shades." Passing over the "classic shades" as applied to girls' colleges, one should like to inquire of the writer where and by whom it is the generally accepted idea that girls go to college for any other purpose than to participate in these same gay doings. Can one pick up a magazine, a newspaper or a Sunday supp. without being confronted by the photographs of "students" attired in fancy costumes, or taking part in some special festivity? Don't we all know about Float day, and theatricals, and hops, and receptions, and Ivy day, and Tree day? Is there any concealment of the hoop-rolling, May-pole festivities, and costume teas? College girls in all the undress of their basket ball and gymnasium costumes are as unblushing as unclothed infants before the camera, and they do not hesitate to furnish copies for the papers any more than do the footballers. No one who is capable of running and reading has any delusion about what takes girls to college. They go for the good time. Some prefer the co-educational colleges with their additional advantages in the shape of male society, but whether the college be co-educational or strictly femaley, the result is the same. It is not study or the opportunity for study which is the attraction, but fun. A college career prolongs the period of irresponsibility and dependence. A woman of twenty-five who is a member of a class is a young girl, though her sister of eighteen, engaged in some self-supporting occupation, is a woman. A college is a good place to make acquaintances; some girls have brothers who are worth cultivating; there are homes worth visiting, and a groundwork for a future social career may be laid by a judicious selection of a college. But whatever takes the girl to college, it assuredly is not a desire for study. There is no character which the attendant can assume so repugnant to her mates as that of the "dig." She will find herself the butt of practical jokes, the object of sarcastic remarks, and the fish out of water generally. She will discover in various ways that colleges are for the training of basket-ball and tennis champions, that time spent over books is wasted and that the accumulation of cushions and class pins is the main object.

The Perfection of Social Art

In these days, when form is superior to substance, so that there is an etiquette for the most trivial occasions, the rehearsal for any ceremony is quite as important as the occasion itself. Accordingly, our beaux and belles rehearse for their weddings, though their ancestors would have regarded any such performance as sacrilegious, and though the society journals have not yet told of the rehearsals for funerals, they are conducted on such lines that one is forced to conclude either that the principals have had the benefit of much experience, or that there have been private tryings-on, lest anything should go amiss and spoil the perfect ensemble at the last. Society is less reticent in other matters, however, so we have been treated to a glimpse of the modus operandi by which a fashionable mamma successfully guided her small son through his baptism. She was greatly perturbed lest the little morsel of humanity should cry or squirm, or otherwise transgress the laws of the Vere de Vere caste, so a fortnight before the date selected for the ceremonial she began to rehearse him in his part, even to the application of the water, so that on the eventful day he really behaved as though he were used to being baptized, and wore the proper blase manner of his world. It all passed off beautifully, and other society dames are recommended to do likewise. This one, at least, proved more sensible than another fashionable matron who concluded to make the baptism of her only darling the occasion of a "function." Now, baby knew not discipline, and his temper was fearfully and wonderfully developed, but mamma assured hubby that he need have no fears, for she had thought of a plan by which he would not disgrace them. And so she had. She sent the youngster to the park with his nurse, after her usual custom, when she wanted to be rid of him, with instructions to keep him out late, and it was not until it was time to proceed with the ceremony that it suddenly occurred to her that a child was a necessary bit of stage property. One can hardly regard baptism as a sacrament when it is administered only because it gives an excuse for social entertainment.

Luring Subscribers

Since the multiplication of magazines competition has become so keen that publishers are frequently driven to the expedient of offering prizes to each new subscriber to the face value, if not more, of the magazine itself. It is noteworthy, however, that unless the inducement is made in the form of a club offer of several periodicals at a substantial reduction from regular rates, the poorer the periodical the more strenuous the solicitation and the more showy the offer. One of these cheap interlopers into the realms of literature is importuning school teachers in particular to take advantage of an unparalleled offer, a choice of any one of twelve books. The first on the list is "The Ladies' Guide to Beauty," and it is lauded as furnishing infallible guides for the perfection of face, form and complexion. Next comes "How Women May Earn Money," and the fortunate possessor of this treasure need only peruse its pages to know all the domestic and decorative arts from A to Izzard. How she is to turn her knowledge to commercial advantage, after this lightning method of acquirement, is another story. Then, there is "The Art of Letter Writing," with its advantages properly set forth. The medical world should be overjoyed to note the fourth offer, "The Family Doctor Book," for by the time the family had been doctored there ought to be a lively demand for physicians. This is really an astonishing treatise, for it discounts the future and guarantees a cure for not only all known ills, but all that are ever likely to be known. Now we are getting down to the real thing, for failing to appreciate any of the foregoing, one may have "The Mystic Oracle," and what one cannot learn from this treatise about past, present and future, this world and the next, hidden treasure, the coming man and the meaning of dreams is not worth finding out. Having disposed of the universe, we are invited to inspect "A Cartload of Fun," a "Young Author's Guide," "Modern Etiquette," "A Handy Cyclopedia," a collection of "Humorous Recitations," another volume of "Wonders, Secrets and Mysteries," in which one may find the recipe for everything short of passing counterfeit coin; then a cookery book, a collection of comic songs and one of conundrums and riddles brings up at the end. Truly, a dainty and appetizing dish with which to tempt the schoolmarm. If the intellectual capacity of the editors and contributors approximates that of the compiler of this list of prize offers, the magazine itself must be both fearful and wonderful.

Words

BY HARRY COWELL

In a block of Carrara the sculptor sees an infinity of faces and forms of unrealizable beauty. The love of the impossible takes possession of him. For a jest the three hags had aforetime lifted to his lips a wine meant for the gods alone, filling his veins with fire; and now the divine drunkenness comes upon him once more, and life within him leaps heavenward like a flame.

On the man fated for letters the dictionary has a similar effect. Therein are words, the wonderful material of his art. Lyrics of unearthly loveliness lie hidden there. With a hundred well-chosen words may a flawless sonnet be made and immortality attained. Between those dull pages lurk essays without number more reasonable than those of Elia or old Montaigne. What are stories by Boccaccio? What are the Arabian Nights? Words well chosen, well arranged.

The love of the word is the beginning of literary wisdom. How Flaubert, the faultless, worshiped it. To him the Word was God. And Ruskin, too—does he not somewhere tell of himself, how he spent a whole forenoon seeking a single adjective? Is not that in truth a red-letter day for writer or for speaker in which he finds a perfect expression? In the phrase, "The innumerous laughter of the ocean waves," the happier spirit of the sea is caught as in a shell. To read of lovers, that they were "imparadised in one another's arms," affects the spine as does the G string of a Stradavarius under the bow of a master.

To think that a few familiar words happily related may defeat Death "doth work like madness in the brain." More powerful is he who has fifteen thousand words at his command than he who has fifteen thousand soldiers. Often, indeed, do words move us to laughter or to tears where life itself leaves us indifferent.

Just now, the light failing, I looked up from my work. Through the most exquisite of pale purples shone the majestic Jupiter, resplendent, to look upon like a god. Wordsworth, of course, came to mind. "Fair as a star when only one is shining in the sky," I quoted to myself. Now the life of the eye I love, and passionately. The senses and I are the very best of friends. But the beauty of the poet's simile is at this moment superior to the beauty of God's star.

"Words," says a master worker in them; "words have not merely music as sweet as that of viol and lute, color as rich and vivid as any that makes lovely for us the canvas of the Venetian or the Spaniard, and plastic form no less sure and certain than that which reveals itself in marble or in bronze, but thought and passion and spirituality are theirs also, are theirs indeed alone."

To a writer of my acquaintance the word "gray" is suggestive of all the sorrows of the ages. "Green" speaks movingly of laughing sunlight on young leaves in spring, of the glory of the grass, of the gladness of the world. So, too, Swinburne: "Green pleasure and gray grief."

How full of memories is "the past"; how full of hopes, "the future!"

"Love" is on every lip, and no one may hear it unmoved. Speak but casually the word of words in the presence of yonder silent woman, and the life will fade out of her cheek and a white fear freeze her eye. She remembers a joy that lived but a night, a bliss that was born in the amorous dusk, that died in the chilly dawn. How beautiful it looked by moonlight—living; how hideous, dead, under the light of day! And then there are "sleep" and "death," that "go to same sweet tune"—a whole world in each word. How brimful of delight is the little word Art. Thereat the eye thinks of statue and painting, the ear of music, both of literature.

The prevalent adjective is an almost perfect index of the quality of a writer's mind. "Green fire," "the white dove of the Eternal," "By Sundown Shores," "The Divine Adventure"—there you have the heart of the fairest myth of modern literature, Fiona Macleod. Delicate words, exquisitely subtle, words wherewith the finest distinctions may be made, characterize the works of Walter Pater and raise "Marius the Epicurean," for instance, to the level of French prose. The vocabulary of an author speaks volumes. Words left to steep in the soul of a writer take on tones, tints and flavors peculiar to his personality, and, together with an individual method of using them, stamp his literary product as his and not the possible work of any other man.

There are men—English-speaking men—who never make use of the word, "beautiful." Is it necessary to know anything more of them than that? With a raucous "screech," Stevenson changes the tune of Pan's pipes; De Maupassant's Beggar "unhooks" himself from his crutches, and the picture is complete, unforgettable. When from describing English architecture, Ruskin turns to paint Italian, he uses a different, a more beautiful tongue, freer and more colorful, as it were, than that of the British Isles.

Speech may have been given to man to conceal therewith his thought, but no man can speak much without speaking of himself. A perpetual avoidance of liquids and open vowels should be sufficient evidence to hang a man.

But beyond the reach of the Word is Life, and beyond the reach of music is life, and beyond the reach of whatever Art has in store for us is life; and yet it is only through art that the life beyond art is possible.

The Pessimist

There is no rose on the broad bleak earth
Worth the labor put forth to raise it;
No scarlet mouth framed in dimpling mirth
Worth the breath that it takes to praise it.

There is no song like the one that's heard
In the time of a life's beginning;
No woman's love worth the empty word
That we waste in its useless winning.

There is no day with its sordid strife
Worth the serious thought we give it,
No passing hour in a careless life
Worth the trouble it takes to live it.

So pluck the rose while you chance to live,
Hold your pleasures as you may find them,
Forget, in joys that those red lips give,
The grin of the skull behind them.

Casey Discusses Native Sons

"I see be th' pa-apers that th' naytiv sons are wanst more off'rin' to sacrifice thimselves on th' althar iv civic juty," said Mr. Casey.

"Phwat's that yer sayin'?" asked Mr. Clancy.

"I've jist rimarked that those galint young men to whom this goldin West owes so much because they silected it f'r a birthplace, are again afther a few public jobs."

"Who'd have more right to thim, I dinnaw?" said Mr. Clancy. "I've sivin iv thim in me own fam'ly an' I ixpect them all to chase poleitical jobs as soon as they're able."

"More power to ye," said Mr. Casey. "You're a man afther Rosevilt's own heart. But don't make Dimmacrats iv them.'

"An' sure that's phwat they'll be."

"Then it'll do them no good to be naytiv sons. They might just as well have been bor-rn in Ireland as to be naytiv son Dimmacrats."

"It's hard to undershtand you, Casey."

"That's because you're not wise to th' usiges iv polite society in your adopted counthry. Th' naytiv sons is a sekrit organizashin, an' it don't permit you to introjuce politics unless you're a Raypublican. Whin a naytiv' son Dimmacrat is runnin' f'r a job divv'le a hand do they give him. 'It's agin' th' by-laws,' sez they, 'an' it's conthrary to th' spirit iv th' constitushin,' sez they, 'iv th' gr-rand ordher iv th' N. S. G. W.,' sez they, 'to use th' organizashin f'r political purposes.' But if a naytiv' Raypublican is out f'r a job it's diff'rint. He's a naytiv' son,' sez they. 'We must all be f'r him,' sez they. An' they are. There's Percie Velong runnin' f'r City Attorney on th' Raypublican ticket; he's a naytiv' son. A man from New York was on th' shlate but it was broken f'r Percie because he was a naytiv' son. He's what I call a profeshinle naytiv' son, but mind you, he's no Dimmacrat."

"Isn't Franklin Kay Lane a naytiv' son?" asked Clancy.

"Yes, iv Canada, where they raise Apayayes, but he's introjuced th' naytiv' son sintiment into th' campaign. He's th' father iv a naytiv' son an' he thinks that as he has made a contribushin to th' ordher he should be illectid May'r. But it has turned out that it was foolish iv him to make that an issue. Ugeen Schmitz is th' father iv three naytives, an' he's one himself, an' Hinn'ry Crocker hasn't been slow at all, at all, f'r he has a brood iv six growin' up, an' as he's a shtrong an' healthy man yet, there's no knowin' how far he may go. So it was a mishtake iv Lane to go blowin' about his solitary shpalpeen until he had a poll takin' iv what th' other fellows had been doin'. Besides, no man with only one child has any rayson to shwell up about it. Axidints occur in th' best regulated fam'lies. It takes more than one to prove deliberashin. However, Clancy, th' way that domestick energy an' fam'ly fertility ar-re cuttin' into this campaign goes to show that in this age iv race suicide, if a man is in politics it pays to have ividence iv th' fact that he's been shwellin' th' censis. If you've nothin' else to blow about you can point with pride to th' childher at home."

"Not unless I want a row on me hands," said Clancy.

"How's that?" asked Casey.

"If you knew Bridget Clancy you wouldn't nade to ask. Herself wouldn't shtand f'r me doin' any blowin' about me achavemints in that line. Bridget sez that th' mother is entitled to all th' credit. 'In soesciety,' sez she, 'it's not th' father that prefers pet dogs to their own flesh an' blood.'"

"An' begorra, she's right, Clancy. It's no throuble f'r a man to be a father. Nayther is he entitled to any credit. If he was, Brigham Young would have earned glory enough to run f'r Presidint. But whin a man who thinks that fatherhood is evidence iv greatness has only one child to blow about, there's something wrong with him. His intenshins are good but his execushin is damn bad. He should never be thrusted with th' administhrashin iv th' affairs iv a great city, f'r he lacks exhaycutive ability."

The Saunterer

One More Yellow Journal

Mr. Dent Robert, managing editor of the Examiner, went to Los Angeles last week with authority to start a Hearst paper in the heart of the citrus belt. Mr. Hearst has been contemplating the launching of another daily paper ever since he made a success of his Chicago venture. He looked over the field in Boston, and it has been rumored several times that he was about to publish a paper in that city. Since his election to Congress it has been reported that he intended to start a yellow journal in Washington, and more than once the story has leaked out that he had agents in Los Angeles looking over the newspaper field in that city, but it was not until Mr. Robert made his appearance there last week that it became known that Mr. Hearst's plans had matured. I understand that Mr. Robert was authorized to purchase the Herald providing the sum asked was not exorbitant; otherwise a press would be shipped from the East, and the new daily would be launched as soon as the plant was in working order.

The Joyful Journalist

With an influential paper operating in Los Angeles Mr. Hearst should have no difficulty in controlling the next State convention at which delegates to the National convention will be selected. The influence of the Examiner over Democratic politicians in the northern part of the State is tremendous, and I have no doubt that a Hearst paper in Los Angeles will be equally effective in dominating party affairs. The leading journal in the South, at present, is the Los Angeles Times, a Republican paper, owned by General Harrison Gray Otis. There is not a more ably conducted paper in the State, and there is none more profitable. It prints as much news as any San Francisco daily, and its net profits aggregate over one hundred thousand dollars a year. No doubt General Otis will prepare to give Willie Hearst the battle of his life, but he will find that he is up against the real thing in competitive journalism. Hearst has prestige and capital and he will make things hum in Los Angeles newspaper circles. There will be a rise in salaries instanter. The working journalist of Los Angeles is already joyful.

Why Williams Went to London

On the heels of the report that Mr. Hearst is about to launch a new daily in Los Angeles, comes the news to me from the Journal office in New York, that the purpose of Mr. T. T. Williams's trip across the Atlantic is to establish a yellow journal plant in London. When Mr. Williams went away it was said that Mr. Hearst had given him a vacation, and that he would stay in Europe until after the local election so that he would not be suspected of taking a hand in politics, it being well known that so great was his contempt for Franklin K. Lane that his sympathies would naturally be with the Republican candidate. But the report from New York is probably true. Mr. Hearst has great confidence in the business ability of the Examiner's business manager, and he is the man most likely to be selected for such an important mission. It was Williams who started the Chicago daily for Hearst, and he launched it in the face of opposition so fierce that he had to employ Pinkerton detectives to protect the delivery wagons. With a European daily added to his string of American papers Hearst will indeed be the Napoleon of journalism. The London office will give him a tremendous advantage over his contemporaries, for it will augment his news service to such an extent that there will be nothing approximating it in the field of journalism, except of course the Associated Press whose service he will continue to have.

Lane and the "Examiner"

There are few men in the country to-day more influential than William R. Hearst, and yet here he is in in California kow-towing to a little, insignificant Democratic machine, controlled by men who have slandered him, who hate him, and who are abusing him with cheap witticisms for the delectation of their followers. It is rather humiliating for a man of his exalted station to feel it expedient to further the political aims of his enemies, but such is the penalty of political ambition even when indulged by the owner of a string of powerful newspapers. The Examiner was opposed to Franklin K. Lane when he was a candidate for Governor, and as soon as the campaign was over Lane went East and sought an interview with Hearst in the hope of winning his friendship. Now Lane is a candidate for Mayor, and as it behooves Hearst to have the local Democracy behind him in his fight for the Presidential nomination, the Examiner is supporting the Democratic ticket from top to bottom. Meanwhile Lane, knowing that Hearst cannot afford to withdraw that support, affects an indifference to the Examiner's attitude. He calculates on having the support of the paper without losing that of its enemies, so he has authorized his touts to go about town quoting him thus: "Mr. Lane says that the Examiner can neither help him nor hurt him in this campaign; it may rehabilitate itself as a Democratic journal."

The Schmitz Fund

The Schmitz campaign fund is said to amount to fifty thousand dollars, and unquestionably the expenses that are being incurred in his behalf will aggregate not less than that sum. Never before in the history of this city was money spent so freely in the interest of a candidate for local office. Every time Jimmy Phelan ran for office he opened an exceptionally large barrel, but never did he distribute money with the recklessness with which Eugene Schmitz is jingling his way through the campaign. There are three thousand saloons in this city, and there is not one that has not at least one Schmitz banner over the bar or one nailed on the outside. Some have two, and nearly all are liberally supplied with Schmitz cards of all sizes. The printing bill alone will amount to at least ten thousand dollars. His buttons bearing his picture, his sign-board and newspaper advertising, and his half-tone work, will aggregate nearly ten thousand more. His electric signs, each of which has one hundred and ten lights, are thirty in number, and each was erected at a cost of not less than one hundred and fifty dollars, and the expense of lighting them is about five dollars per night apiece. They are to be maintained about thirty nights.

The Source of Supply

To these trifles should be added such incidentals as hall-rent, cost of maintaining headquarters, salaries of numerous messengers, touts and banner carriers, and the price of maintaining a reputation for good-fellowship all over town. It will surely require the services of an expert business manager to keep the total cost of the campaign under fifty thousand dollars. However, as Mr. Schmitz has held office for two years he surely knows how much he is justified in risking in the venture which now occupies his attention. But of course all the money is not coming out of his pockets. He has put money into the purse of Mr. Ruef, several commissioners are indebted to him for a liberal salary, and one of them, Mr. Drinkhouse, has developed his business enormously through his influence as a Police Commissioner. When Mose Gunst was a Police Commissioner he amassed a fortune through the sale of cigars to the three thousand saloons under his official jurisdiction. Mr. Drinkhouse's cigar trade has also been greatly stimulated since his appointment to the Police Commission, for his drummers have been very active among saloon-keepers. A contribution from him of five or ten thousand dollars to the Schmitz campaign fund would be merely a happy business stroke. And then, last but not least, there is Mr. Abraham Ruef, who has become so eminent in his profession that his fees are said to aggregate sixty thousand a year under the benign influence of his tried and true puppet. So it may be readily seen that a fifty-thousand-dollar campaign fund for Eugene is a mere bagatelle.

Record Damages in a Libel Suit

The largest verdict in a newspaper libel suit ever recorded in this State was given here last week against the Examiner. The daily papers have an agreement under which they suppress news against the "peace, dignity and reputation" of one another, and consequently no mention of the suit or of the verdict appeared in any of their columns. The case is interesting in several particulars. It has been stubbornly fought through the courts for ten years, and, as there is sure to be another appeal, there is no telling how long it will last. The suit was brought by J. W. Turner, a Plumas attorney, against W. R. Hearst. In 1893 the case of a man named Thomas against Lotta Crabtree, the actress, was dragging on here in the courts. All sorts of charges were made in the complaint, and in writing up the case the Examiner reporter somehow got the name of John W. Turner mixed in the article with that of his client and referred to him as a man who had been charged with swindling. Turner promptly brought suit for fifty thousand dollars damages. An effort was made to patch up the case by offering to publish a retraction, but the retraction was not given to the world till some weeks later. Turner declared it came too late for any good and pressed his suit.

On the first trial he was given damages for five hundred dollars. Hearst appealed and a new trial was granted. Next time, in 1895, Turner got a verdict of one hundred and fifty dollars. This time it was Turner who appealed. On the third hearing, which occurred last week, Turner got a verdict for fifteen thousand dollars. Attorney J. C. Bates, who handled his case, sent up to Sacramento for Grove L. Johnson to come down and do the final talking to the jury, and, as Johnson has a grievance against the Examiner, he promptly responded. However, I do not think his client will ever recover any money, for the Examiner was clearly innocent of any intention to wrong him. The objectionable article was the result of the confusion of names, but the paper was somewhat slow in publishing a retraction. Heretofore the record damages in a libel suit in this State was seven thousand five hundred dollars, given in the case of Degan against Fitch. The average amount of damages in the fourteen successful libel suits against newspapers is about two thousand two hundred and fifty dollars. The record libel damages in this country is one in New York, where a twenty-five thousand dollar verdict was awarded.

How Troy Wes Libeled

A few weeks ago the Examiner came near being involved in another libel suit through the blunder of one of its staff. A reporter was writing a caption for the picture of a murderer named Troy, and he put this question to his assembled confreres: "What are the initials of this man

Troy?" The reply came in a chorus: "E. P. E." They all thought that he meant the local agitator who has been trying to purify politics and reform the community for several years. So the picture was published as that of E. P. E. Troy, and the proud possessor of those initials invaded the Examiner office the next day in a high state of choler. He was promptly given a retraction.

Lily Lawlor Has a New Angel

Lily Lawlor is to take my advice and impart to others some of her knowledge of the vocal art. She is to open a studio in New York where she will cultivate the voices of the Four Hundred. I hear that Mrs. Astor has taken her up and that she will pilot her through the eddies of the social whirl this winter. With such a sponsor Miss Lawlor will have no difficulty in getting ten dollars for a half-hour lesson, and that is the price she intends charging the swells. She is a very tactful woman and deserves success. Her cordial, urbane manner won her a great many friends among the wealthy people of this city, and when she decided to go to Paris to study the vocal art they subscribed generously toward a fund to defray the cost of the venture. She studied with the best masters and was entertained extensively by smart Americans in the French capital, where she lived in fashionable apartments. Indeed Miss Lawlor has enjoyed all those good things of life which are usually reserved for the daughters of the very rich, and yet when her father died all she had in the world was his insurance money, amounting to ten thousand dollars, no part of which has she ever found it necessary to spend.

The Power of Magnetism

Nevertheless she lives in luxury, dresses magnificently, sports a French maid, travels across the continent in a private car, and now she is the protegee of the Queen of New York's Four Hundred. The story of her career reads like a fairy tale, and one cannot escape the conviction that she is surcharged with personal magnetism. If she had a great voice one could more easily account for the interest that has been taken in her, but she hasn't. Of course she has excited envy. I have heard it said that when she was here last summer, her manner was at first delightfully cordial, and that she hypnotized everybody she met. She was invited everywhere, and presents were showered upon her, but towards the end of her visit she assumed an air of hauteur which lost her some friends. The fact is, I presume, she was bored, but since her departure the anvil chorus has been working overtime. A story has been circulated to the effect that she snubbed some people, and that one woman who had been very kind to her was given the "overlook" at her concert. This particular woman is not of the haut ton but she is very wealthy and had given Miss Lawlor many presents; yea, even the ermine coat Miss Lawlor wore that night, costing it is said a cool thousand, was the gift, so the knockers say, of this wealthy woman. However, if the wealthy woman complained, and spoke about her gift, all obligations so far as Miss Lawlor was concerned were off.

They Have Forgiven

When Leah Shingleberger eloped with Jack Daniel she forfeited the affection of her aunt and uncle, the Gustave Niebaums. Leah had lived in their family ever since the death of her parents, and she was like a daughter to them. She had everything that her heart could desire, and she made her debut in society under most propitious circumstances. But she chose to resign her luxurious home for love's sweet sake. The Niebaums would not forgive their pretty niece's act of disobedience for a long time, but a short time ago they relented, and now everything is harmony again. They have also, I hear, forgiven their nephew who, like his sister, made a romantic marriage.

The stork brought a gift to the home of Dr. Alonzo Hudgens, the Tonopah magnate, two weeks ago. As it was the first gift of that nature in the Hudgens household, its welcome was naturally very enthusiastic. Dr. Hudgens, it will be remembered, bought the Dunphy place at Millbrae some months since.

To Join Her Children

Mrs. Robert Louis Stevenson will leave for New York city in a few days, where she will spend the winter. She has leased apartments in Washington Square in the same house that Mrs. Frank Norris had her headquarters whenever she was in the metropolis. Mrs. Stevenson desires to be near her children, Lloyd Osbourne and Isobel Strong, who have made New York their residence. Lloyd Osbourne has been quite a disappointment to his friends. Great things were expected of him a few years ago, but he has not achieved much in a literary way. Austin Strong is said to have made a success as a landscape gardener and is in great demand by the multi-millionaires who employ him to improve the grounds of their country homes.

A Gentlewoman Shocked

The marriage of Miss Floyd, a rich girl, to a poor but respectable gripman, in this city last week, was a blow that almost killed Madame L. Bavarde. The thought of a rich American girl marrying merely for love staggered her with disgust and indignation. In her own picturesque language, it was "too incredible to be believed." She maundered about it for half a column. Her comments on the marriage read like the hysterical utterances of a mourner at an Irish wake. She attributed the action of Miss Floyd to the fact that she was not reared as a society butterfly, and then, with the candor born of an obtuseness almost profound, she told of the early training of the girl, showing that her young life was spent in a most wholesome atmosphere, and in a manner calculated to inspire her with higher ideals than are usually cherished by the simpering, soulless daughters of the conventional rich. But as her girlhood was spent far from the Friday Fortnightlies, where the seines are set by match-making mammas to catch the gold-fish, Madame La Bavarde felt that she was tremendously handicapped for life's struggle. Considering her early training, the probability is that Miss Floyd made a very good match, but despite the advantages of her youth, who knows but that she inherited a narrow intellect from her mother, who, according to Madame La Bavarde, was "the most exclusive, haughtiest woman of her day." I am inclined to sympathize with a girl who comes from that brand of mother. It would not be incredible that the daughter of such a mother surrendered her heart to a fellow who wasn't even an intelligent gripman.

Shafter and Sybil

Shafter Howard will find his occupation gone, now that the symphony concerts are over. He is worthily jubilant at their financial success, for which his excellent management was largely responsible. In these days business acumen must go side by side with art, else the latter languishes. Mr. Howard is as good a musician as he is a financier, and the songs he has written are charming. He may attempt an opera some day. Shafter Howard, by the way, was a playmate of Sybil Sanderson. When Sybil came hither with the Grau opera company, one of the first of her old friends with whom she renewed acquaintance was Mr. Howard, and she reminded him that they used to make mud pies together. However, she refused to go out to dinner with him, and when her godmother, Mrs. John F. Swift, who thought an opera singer could do anything, asked her why, she answered:

"Oh, I couldn't, you know, go out to dinner with a married man."

The Craze for Crests

The use of crests by Americans who have no right to them is becoming quite common. Of course the practice is undemocratic in the extreme but the crests are pretty and obliging stationers will provide you with them at very little cost. Some American families, of course, have crests, but few American families, even if they have them, have the right to use them, for that involves permission from the Heralds' Hall of London, and that is not only expensive but it involves tedious proof of links of relationship. Still, when there is a crest in the family, even when the intermediate links are not proved up and the Heralds' College never heard of the aspiring American, it is not quite so bad as getting one from the stationer. One of the funniest examples of the use of a crest in San Francisco is in a certain new house in the western addition. The owner of the house bought a fireplace abroad. It was of wood and beautifully carved and on the wood was the crest of the former owner. The fireplace was installed in the partially completed house and then the owner had the coat of arms carved in stone and mounted over the front door.

She Dislikes All Titles

I am told that Mrs. "Stuyve" Fish's dislike to titles is not an assumed one. She even objects to the word "gentleman," asserting that "man" is good enough for her. She was in a Broadway store one day and the floorwalker, who recognized her, kow-towed and asked:

"Is any gentleman attending to you?"

"Yes," responded Mrs. Fish, "I believe the nobleman with the bald head is looking after me."

Perhaps It Was Collusive

In a recent Oakland divorce suit there was more than a suspicion of collusion. The judge took the case under advisement and pending the issuance of the decree the husband went to his attorney and asked, "Is there any objection to my taking my wife out automobiling?"

"Well," said the lawyer, "under the circumstances I think perhaps you had better wait until the case is decided." They went, but it was after dark.

Stanford Students Indignant

The students of Stanford University are wildly indignant over the news that they are soon to be required to be indoors by eleven o'clock every night. Dr. Jordan has announced that he will soon give notice that such is the rule of the university, and that all electric lights on the campus will go out at that hour. To enforce the rule he intends organizing a system of police so that every infraction shall be reported to the faculty. The students say that if such a rule is enforced Dr. Jordan will turn the university into a prep. boarding school, and there is talk of mutiny. It was formerly Dr. Jordan's boast that he made no rules for governing the conduct of the students; that he merely expected them to behave as gentlemen, but this year he is so exacting in his discipline that the students feel as though they were under the dominion of a martinet. At the opening of the term the students found the bulletin board covered with little notices, signed by the president, of what they should do and what they should not do. There was considerable grumbling among the students, but it was not until they heard that they were to be expected to be indoors at eleven o'clock, that they began holding indignation meet-

MODEL GOWNS AND FRENCH LINGERIE REDUCED

Beginning next Monday, October 19th, the Emporium's beautiful model gowns for Fall and Winter 1903-04 will be offered at a reduction of one-third to one-half of the original prices. These charming examples of the dressmaker's art, designed by some of the most famous modistes in Europe, have been in the store but little more than a month, but they have served their purpose as model gowns, and now right at the beginning of the season they are offered at less than the actual cost of importation.

In conjunction with this sale a large line of French Lingerie —single pieces and bridal sets—will be offered at one-third less than regular prices. Every garment is made by hand, charmingly designed and beautifully trimmed.

At Outs with Mrs. Stanford

Mrs. Stanford, by the way, is no longer an admirer of David Starr Jordan, and before her departure she did not hesitate to express her disapproval of his methods. She felt very keenly the criticism which the university received at the time of the dismissal of Professor Ross. She blamed Jordan and Jordan blamed her. She is now in India, whither she went after visiting her brother-in-law in Australia, and she will not return home for two years. She is now over seventy years of age but she says she has no fear while traveling because her husband and son are always by her side. I hear that she intended to adopt her niece, Jennie Lathrop, of whom she has always been very fond, but that her attorneys informed her that such an act might complicate the university endowment yet to be made. Miss Lathrop was educated in convents in this State and in Paris, to which she was sent by Mrs. Stanford.

Mrs. Mills Stood Aloof

Apropos the engagement of George Crocker's stepdaughter, Emma Wallace Rutherford, and Philip Kearny, grandson of General Phil Kearny, an Eastern paper reports that Mrs. Crocker has not found smooth waters to sail on at all times since her residence in New York. Several of Mr. Crocker's relatives and old family associates did not take kindly to her. She has been treated courteously by Mrs. C. B. Alexander and Mrs. Whitelaw Reid, but Mrs. Ogden Mills has stood aloof. George Crocker, through his purchase of "Darlington," became one of the three owners of the beautiful Ramapo Valley, and he is now building a million-dollar house on a height overlooking the valley. Philip Kearny will inherit about a million dollars out of the estate left by his grandfather.

When They Were in Paris

The W. H. Mills's are contemplating a trip abroad, and they expect to have a better time this trip than when they were in Paris during the Exposition. At that time they had little idea of the way the French live, and they amused the Parisians by having their own Irish cook as a part of their menage. Though she was all right in San Francisco, she was not a success in Paris. She could speak no French, and as the cooks of Paris do their own marketing, she was seriously handicapped. Mrs. Mills tried to do the catering, but shopkeepers in Paris object to ladies' marketing, and prefer to deal directly with the cooks, who receive a little commission. When Mrs. Mills and her home importation had both failed to accomplish the marketing, the latter was replaced by a French cook. Miss Mills will not accompany the rest of the family if they go abroad as she intends going to Manila. Elizabeth Mills, the younger sister, who never came out in society, is expected to do great things in literature. She is credited with having the brain of her father.

Her Nob Hill Millinery

Mrs. Eleanor Martin has arrived in Newport, and according to a New York paper she has with her the latest "Nob Hill millinery." The society reporter probably saw her under that white bonnet with the nodding plumes which she wore in a box at the Columbia theatre some weeks ago, and which was a wonderful and impressive creation. It wasn't inartistic, but it was in the nature of an anachronism on the head of a grandmother. However, Mrs. Martin has a right to affect the raiment of the young if it suits her taste, even though it accentuates her age. The same New York paper that referred to the "Nob Hill millinery" wondered how many servants Mrs. Lil would discharge during the visit of her mother-in-law. Evidently the reputation of the Mrs. Astor of San Francisco, for economy, preceded her to New York.

Some Romantic Doings

Secret marriages, runaway matches and precipitate weddings are the theme of society's gossip these days. There have been some very romantic and some very sensational occurrences of late, in the inner circles. Many of them are discussed in whispers. The news of the secret marriage of Marian Harrison and Richard Sperry a year ago, which has just come out, occasioned a deal of surprise. The two were sweethearts when they were little tots. "Richie" has always been true to his first love, but Marian has had much sentimental experience in the twenty-one years of her life. Her dimples and her fascinating ways won her many admirers. At one time it was understood that she was engaged to Jack Hoffman. That was when she was spending much of her time as the guest of his sister Alice in San Rafael. Then there were rumors of her engagement with Tom Van Ness, who was a devoted swain for a time. Jack Wilson was next on the list, and his admiration for the pretty girl was expressed in many ways. Cupid surely plays strange pranks. From an experienced man of the world to a boy not yet of age is certainly a radical change of heart. Richard Sperry is a handsome youth, son of the late James W. Sperry, manager of the Sperry Flour Mills. His courtship was conducted under difficulties, for both Mr. and Mrs. Harrison were opposed to the match. His meetings with his lady-love were held clandestinely but they managed to see a great deal of each other.

There is a big demand for houses in San Mateo, and all the available ones in Burlingame have been secured for Eastern people who are coming out this winter to play polo. Many of our society people have gone East to attend the Horse Show in New York which opens on November sixteenth, but they will return for the winter gayety which promises to be greater than ever. The Raoul Duvals are among those coming out for the polo games.

The Professional Husband of Bagdad

Dr. Sundberg, ex-consul to Bagdad, has been delighting large audiences of women here with discourses on the ways of men with maids in the far-away, amorous, mysterious East. Dark are they, and one too many for the modern philosopher, as for Solomon of old. Compared with them the way of ship on the sea or of eagle in the air is simplicity itself. Nothing is more entertaining to women than to hear how Cupid behaves himself abroad—except, of course, how he misbehaves himself at home. In Bagdad, as we are informed, courtship is hard, divorce easy. Let a man, for any reason, or no reason at all, grow aweary of the wife of his bosom, or, rather, one of the wives of his bosom, and all he has to do is to say to her before witnesses, three times in as many months: "You are divorced!" and the thing is done and the marriage undone. As it is unlawful for a man to remarry his divorcee until she shall have wedded another and been again divorced or else widowed, there are those who make a profession of marrying divorced women wanted back by their former husbands. The business is diverting and profitable.

Diagnosing Under Difficulties

The good doctor related with much gusto and no little artistry an adventure that befell himself in a Mohammedan harem in Bagdad. One of the wives of a rich merchant fell sick and Dr. Sundberg was called on to prescribe for her. With a pardonable scientific interest the Western physician waited. Enter a black gunnysack. It is the patient. The doctor would like to feel her pulse. A white hand is slipped through an opening. Good; and her tongue—Impossible! No man save her husband may see the face of a woman and live; or, more accurately, no woman may unveil her face to any man save her husband, and live. His professional interest aforesaid deeply aroused, the diplomatic doctor insists. The difficulty is at length solved by the eunuch-in-chief: Though the woman may not lawfully unveil herself, the doctor under the circumstances might perhaps be allowed to crawl in under the gunnysack and so examine the telltale tongue. "Delighted, I'm sure," says the doctor, and does so. Then, after the most thorough diagnosis imaginable, he prescribes, as did Abernethy before him: "A little sun and air!"

"Society is just pining for a new sensation," writes a contemporary chronicler of social events in the East. It is quite different out here-where we have new sensations galore. The latest seems to be Ayala, a new French champagne which is creating no little stir in the circles of the exclusive.

His Hawaiian Experience

Southard Hoffman is expected here early in December. Since taking up his residence in Honolulu he has had much interesting experience. For awhile he shone as the Ward McAllister of the islands but lately he has dropped from view. His engagement to a prominent Honolulu belle caused quite a flutter at one time, and during one of his visits here he spent his time selecting presents for her. Gorgeous silk stockings and a silver toilet set were in the collection. It was after this affair was over that Mr. Hoffman's devotion to one of our local society girls, who was on a tour of the world, caused a good deal of unpleasant gossip in Honolulu. By the way, Ogden Hoffman expects to give up his detective work very soon and go into business in China.

Kempton and Wace Abroad

Jack London is going to get at the heart of things in London's East End, when he takes up his residence in the world's metropolis. He will live with the poor, eat what they eat, and enter thoroughly into their hard daily lives. This has been done before, and recorded in Walter Besant's novels, but London will do it in his own way, and the result should be Zolaistic. The author has been prevented from taking his contemplated trip by the illness of one of his children. Miss Anna Strunsky, his collaborator in "The Kempton-Wace Letters," is in London where she will remain for some time.

Elsie Tallant will probably debut this winter. She was thrown into mourning about a year ago by her father's death, and her entrance into society this season will likely be under the wings of her aunts, Mrs. Brice and Mrs. Fred Tallant. Miss Tallant is a very pretty girl, rosy-cheeked, with black hair and eyes. She was educated abroad and has been passing several months in the East with Mrs. Tallant.

Marie's Little Sister

Marie Wells has a younger sister who is going to make a hit when she is of age to enter society. She is only fourteen, but she is so tall and well developed that she looks fully two years older. She is to be taken abroad soon to study under foreign teachers. George R. Wells, their father, recently had an offer to sell a mine he owns for one hundred thousand dollars, but he refused it.

Mrs. Sam Buckbee will not probably be seen at any large functions this winter. She is wearing light mourning for her father-in-law, Rev. C. A. Buckbee.

Mrs. W. H. Clary and Mrs. J. D. Peters were among those who entertained Miss Clara Alexander during her visit to Stockton this week. In Sacramento she was also the recipient of hospitality from the society leaders of that city. Last night she gave a recital in Chico, and I understand will shortly go to Vacaville with Miss Daisy Polk, the latter giving a violin recital in connection with Miss Alexander's darky dialect. Miss Polk was a member of the original Saturday Morning Orchestra here. She is a sister of Willis Polk, the architect, and Dan Polk, the banjoist, who forsook society for the stage some time ago.

The Return of Spring

Henry Spring has returned to San Jose after an absence of several years, during which time he toured Europe. His long, sensational legal battle with his wife in the divorce courts, and the litigation over his property, resulting therefrom, aroused much interest at the time, and his reappearance in California has excited considerable speculation, for it is understood that the two hundred dollars a month alimony which was granted the wife is still running. Mrs. Spring was a daughter of John Tennant, now deceased, one of the wealthiest men of Santa Clara county, and at his death Mrs. Spring inherited a large portion of his estate. Henry Spring became one of San Jose's most prosperous business men, and about six years ago his wife brought suit for divorce and connected his name with the wife of another prominent business man. She was granted a divorce, but meanwhile Spring left San Jose for the East without paying the alimony as ordered. To collect what was due her, Mrs. Spring caused an attachment to be levied on a big clothing establishment of which her husband had been proprietor, but it was then found that he had turned over all his property in San Jose to Fred W. Moore, his brother-in-law, and after protracted litigation Mrs. Spring failed to secure anything. While the litigation was in progress Spring was enjoying the sights of the old country. During the past year or two Mrs. Spring has resided in San Francisco and the report has gone out that she has spent or lost nearly all the fortune which she inherited from her father.

She's Skilled With the Sword

A very interesting woman has taken up her residence in Sausalito. She is Mrs. Francis Davis who recently came to California from the East. As Miss Chapman she was a noted beauty of Philadelphia. She was an heiress and belonged to the smart set of Baltimore as well as of the Quaker City. Mrs. Davis is a very accomplished woman but it is as a fencer that she is especially skilled. Indeed she enjoys the reputation of being the best woman fencer in the world. She studied with some of the most expert duelists of France and Italy, and she frequently gave private exhibitions during her sojourn abroad. Mr. Davis until very recently held large interests in the coffee industry in Brazil. It is a great treat to be invited to the Davis home in Sausalito.

When She Was Engaged to Peter

Isabelle McKenna, whose engagement with Pitts Duffield, General Duffield's son, was wired this week from Washington, was seven years ago the fiancee of Peter Martin. I have always understood that the betrothal of the daughter of Justice McKenna of the Supreme bench and the son of Mrs. Eleanor Martin was not a real heart affair, but a family arrangement. Peter was at college when the engagement was first hinted at, and his aunt, Mrs. Donahue, and his mother were delighted to think the lad's affections had been so worthily bestowed. The fond mamma and auntie kept interest alive in the McKenna home by sending frequent gifts of flowers to Peter's fiancee. But something occurred to change the course of true love. The engagement was abruptly broken, and then the gossips began to speculate as to the cause. Somebody gave currency to the report that Peter Martin had never been in love with Miss McKenna, and that he squirmed out of the engagement. That story was given credence and is believed by many to this day, though it is absolutely untrue. It was Judge McKenna who broke off the engagement, and his reason for doing so was for years unknown to anybody outside of the McKenna and Martin families except the late Senator Steve White.

The Woman in Politics

The American wives of foreign statesmen appear to be taking a deep interest in the vacant British Ambassadorship at Washington. So far no man has been considered eligible for the position who has not an American woman for a wife. Unlike the German, the British Foreign Office has no objection to sending to a foreign country a representative who is married to a daughter of that country, and in England the impression prevails that the man who will be deemed most qualified for the Washington post is one who has a wife noted for her amiability and tact. Feminine influence is more potent in British political circles than anywhere else in the world.

The Stork in Oakland

The stork descended in Oakland this week, as I predicted he would, and left a baby girl in the household of Dr. and Mrs. J. P. H. Dunn. Now he is hovering over the home of Mr. and Mrs. Frederick Magee.

An Epigrammatic Tot

The girl baby of the late Thomas Magee is, according to all accounts, a wonderful prodigy. Her epigrams are being constantly repeated in social circles. She is a miss of only three and yet she is credited with this: "I do hope they have a good cook in heaven; if they don't my father will leave and go to hell."

A Mistake in Walters

The Walter Magees and the Walter Hobarts are great friends, and in the same social set, consequently this little misunderstanding was quite natural. Not long ago a son was born to the Walter Magees, and one of the Blingum set remarked to a friend that "Walter" had a son. The friend, knowing that the Hobarts were hoping for a son, immediately cabled a message to England conveying the joy of Blingum to the Hobarts. Other cables followed and the Hobarts knew not what to make of the rain of messages. However ten days later their little son was born. Then they cabled:

"A little in advance, but thanks all the same."

The Photo Solon

An usual throng commingling society and representatives of the arts attended the members' reception opening the Photographic Salon at the Hopkins' on Thursday night of last week. There was the usual good music rendered by Sir Henry Heyman's orchestra, and the usual criticisms passed upon the exhibits. But there was a much larger disgruntled element present than heretofore. At the last photographic salon nearly everything sent in went with the committee, and the result was a most genial feeling among our local camera experts. This year the percentage of accepted prints was small, only one hundred and seventy-five out of the one thousand submitted having passed the censors. It was not because the eight hundred and twenty-five were not good, but that the others were better. The committee cannot be blamed for rejections under such conditions, nevertheless a deal of bitterness obtruded itself among the non-elect. Among the prints Pedar Bruguiere's "Trees and Clouds" holds conspicuous place. It has quite a Cadenasso atmospheric effect. Boye's "Joaquin Miller" is artistic and lifelike. Walter Zimmermann sent some fine prints from Philadelphia. Dassonville, Maurer, Wilcox and the other art-photographers make a good showing. But interest largely centres in the works sent by the Photo Secession of New York, which cover the walls at the east end of the gallery.

The Newspaper Artists

The most interesting art exhibition ever given in this city was that of the Newspaper Artists in Maple hall last week. Anybody who missed seeing it cannot too deeply regret the loss. There was no great style about the affair, but the pictures were worth spending a whole day over. The marine sketches alone could have formed an exhibition by themselves. Coulter's big painting did not properly come under the sketch head, but it could not have been spared. There is not space here for mention of each artist, but I warrant no other city can show more talented and brilliant work. Laura Foster shows the touch of genius in her pen-and-ink sketch, "On the Crest of the Sunset Sea," a woman's nude body buffeted by the waves. There's poetry in Maynard Dixon's "Spirit of the West," and Newberry's pretty women ought to make him as famous as Gibson or Wenzell. Haig Patigian and Virgil Nahl have the Parisian touch in their sketches. Nahl is decidedly the inheritor of his father's talent. Another man of genius is Cahill. His big sketch of a girl's head, dreamy eyes looking out from a mass of raven hair, is one of his most poetic contributions to newspaper art.

J. W. Cantrell of the Call, who has quite a showing in the exhibition, is making more money than the average artist. He adds to his exchequer by painting whisky signs throughout the country. Whenever in his travels he gets an inspiration for a picture, he makes a sketch, and brings his canvases to town later on. This combination of talent and business ability is hard to beat.

Surprised by His Wife

Train-robber Chris Evans is once more trying to get out of the penitentiary on the score of ill-health, mental sufferings, etc. It was his habit to spread a good many of such afflictions before they succeeded in penning him behind the bars. Singularly enough his supporters all believe he would be a free man today if it had not been for his wife's surprising action; the same wife who stood by him so devotedly the time he was being chased up and down the Sierra slopes by ordinary blood-hounds, poor Indians and worse detectives. Why she acted as she did none of them vouchsafe to explain. It came about in this wise: The last time Evans got up his petition for liberty he was given a tip that if he could get the county officials, the right railroad people, the jury that convicted him, and his wife to sign the petition it would be granted. By hook and by crook he obtained all the signatures asked for down to that of his wife. When the paper was presented to her she flatly refused to sign it, and Chris still groans out his life behind the bars and dreams of other petitions. They say he has failed a great deal in the past year. Confinement and the loss of an arm and eye in that famous fight with the deputy sheriffs at Stone corral, where his partner Sontag was killed, have completely altered him from the daring fellow who defied the pursuing posses so long.

How "Pete" Bequeathed His Fame

"Pete" Bigelow, who glorified his pyrotechnic career in that exciting "man hunt," through his interview with the bandits for the Examiner, has left one kind of imperishable fame in the Fresno uplands, and that is the name of Bigelow. In the course of bandit chasing "Pete" got very chummy with Clark Moore, the man who stood "next" to Chris Evans. He became thoroughly enamored of the picturesqueness of the landscape there and bought a quarter section of land from Moore. Soon afterwards he moved the whole Bigelow family—his father, brother and sisters—from this city to the ranch. The brother and sisters have since married and now there are little Bigelows running all over the Sierra hillslopes thereabouts. Aside from farming several mellow hill patches the brother has a position of forest ranger, so between what is furnished him by Providence and what is given him by the government, he gets along comfortably—a family situation to delight the heart of the resourceful "Pete."

That Famous Interview with Evans

By the way, the true story of how "Pete" got his famous interview with Evans and Sontag has never been told. At the time most people believed the interview was a fake and took no stock in the highly colored stories of the affair offered by enterprising papers. But the interview did take place and a man who was present gave me the details. The meeting was purely accidental. At the time Bigelow was haunting the environs of the Sanger-Millwood road, trying, like the detectives and professional "gun-men," to locate the robbers. One day while he was trying to get over to Samson Flat Clark Moore came driving up the road from Squaw Valley. The two had never met before. "Clark," called the storekeeper, "here's a young feller wants to get over Samson Flat way. How about giving him a lift?" and he winked at Clark. "Pete" was spending Examiner money freely on that trip and the wink signified that he was O. K. on that score and had no affiliations with the hated railroad people. "Hop in," said Clark, and "Pete" hopped in. In those days everybody was talking Evans and Sontag and the two dropped naturally into that discussion. "Pete" frankly told his business and said he would give anything in life for an interview with the bandits. Clark looked uninterested. Presently they came to a clearing in the forest at the further end of which stood a cabin. A man suddenly appeared in the doorway and shouted to Moore. "Hold the lines," said Clark and he jumped out. In about twenty minutes he returned to Bigelow and said: "So you want to meet Evans and Sontag, do you? Well, come along; I've fixed it up for you." Moore first searched the newspaper man to make sure he carried no weapons, then he took him to the cabin. Inside, Evans and Sontag, armed to the teeth, were seated on the side of a rough cedar slab bed. They made Bigelow sit close between them, and while Clark Moore stood watch outside the famous interview took place.

End of the Melodrama

The people who stood out so luridly in that exciting melodrama are now scattered widely over the Pacific coast. The family practically dropped out of sight when the weird play, written around the mother and children to exploit the feats of the daring train robbers, was taken off the boards. The flaxen-haired Eva Evans, who so spunkily stood up for her father on all occasions, married and settled on a Washington farm. The mother and the other children are working about Visalia, Goshen and that vicinity. Clark Moore joined the Klondike rush. One winter's day he started over a rough trail and was never seen again.

Some Posthumous Poetry

With this issue of Town Talk begins the publication of a series of poems from the pen of that gifted writer, the late Dr. C. W. Doyle, of Santa Cruz, whose literary achievements won for him the praise of some of the most captious of critics. Dr. Doyle was a true poet. He was skilled in the art of employing words in such a manner as to produce an illusion on the imagination; the art of doing with words what the painter does with colors. And he has written poetry that deserves to be remembered. The poems that have come into my possession are from a manuscript volume which the poet had compiled shortly before his death. The one which appears in this issue, entitled "Interpretation," the theme having been suggested by a quatrain from the "Rubaiyat," is decidedly novel. There is in it that vigor of thought and great warmth of feeling which were characteristic of the poet's work.

The Mikado's Fighters

Let no one deceive himself into the belief that a conflict between Russia and Japan would result in anything like a walkover for the former. Quite the contrary. Japan can put up a stiff fight against any power in the world. Her navy, it is true, is only about half as powerful as that of Russia in number of ships, but it has its advantage in being concentrated in Oriental waters, at the scene of probable operations, where the Russian fleet assembled is barely a numerical match for it. When it comes to types of ships, Japan has, if anything, slightly the better of it. Her battleships are of larger size and greater power than those of Russia, and are the latest products of the best European shipyards. Her cruisers are mostly recent outputs of English and American yards, and she has even built some excellent ones herself. When it comes to personnel, I should pin my faith in the Japanese. The Japanese officers, both of the army and navy, are highly educated, highly trained men, well versed in the technical theory as well as in the practice of their professions. Many of them have received their military education in the best schools of Europe and at the Annapolis Naval Academy. They are masters of their art, and their little brush with China a few years ago gave them good practice in actual war. Their ships are well kept and well handled, and as for their army, its admirable qualities were well demonstrated during the campaign of the allies in China three years ago, when the sturdy little Japs showed themselves to be splendid fighters and the best marchers in the whole column, ending their day's march nearly every time well in advance of their Occidental competitors, fresh, spick and span, and in the pink of fighting condition, while the other troops were generally dirty, foot-sore and tired out. With the remarkable adaptability, intelligence and earnestness in progress which have characterized their tremendous strides forward along other lines of civilization, the Japs have developed a highly trained, thoroughly equipped and efficient army and navy of which any nation might be proud. The Russians will have their hands full unless they can prolong the war until Japan's financial resources are exhausted.

His Favorite Story

Word comes from the East that Dr. Mackenzie is meeting with the same success in his new charge as always attended him in his old. He is as canny as ever, very prosperous financially and immensely popular as a dinner guest because of his wonderful gift for telling Scotch stories—a gift not surpassed by that of Ian Maclaren. One of his favorite stories was about his visit to his good grandmother in Scotland. The old lady lived in a primitive, peat-stained cottage, and when her grandson reached the house and they had been joined by a neighbor she went to a hospitable cupboard and produced a bottle of Scotch "whuskey" which she offered to her guests. Dr. Mackenzie declined to drink, whereupon the old woman reproached him for being above drinking with an old woman in her cottage. It took him some moments and cost him some effort to explain that in America clergymen, even Scotch clergymen, do not drink. The old woman was not satisfied, but finally, as a compromise, she insisted that, since her grandson would not drink with them, he should at least ask a blessing over their nips, which he did.

Married a San Franciscan

It was in San Francisco that Admiral Kempf, who was retired last Sunday after a long and worthy naval service, met, wooed, won and married his late wife. She was Cornelia Selby, second daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Thomas H. Selby, and her wedding with Lieutenant Kempf was one of the notable events of that day. The Selbys, who were among our wealthiest people, occupied a fine house in what was then one of the most fashionable residence quarters of the city—Harrison street near Second. Every winter they gave large functions.

Will Go East to be Married

Mary Kip is having a very elaborate trousseau made for her marriage with Dr. Robinson, which is to be celebrated at the home of the former's sister, Mrs. Guy Edie, in Columbus, Ohio. The Kips gave up their home some time since, and as they are in mourning for the late Rev. W. I. Kip the wedding would of course be a quiet one if solemnized here. Dr. Robinson, I hear, is a most devoted fiance. One of his gifts to his bride-elect was a beautiful diamond ring. Solitaires, by the way, are no longer the correct thing for betrothals. Either the birthstone set in diamonds or a medium-sized solitaire framed in tiny diamonds is the proper caper in engagement rings.

Trouble at a Wedding Rehearsal

An interesting difference of religious opinion, rare in these days when differences of creed count for so little, occurred at the rehearsal for the Davis-Morgan wedding The bride is an Episcopalian, and the groom comes of most distinguished Unitarian ancestry, being the grandson of Thomas Starr King. The couple were married according to the Episcopal forms, but the pastor of the First Unitarian church assisted and gave his blessing. When the rehearsing party came to that portion of the marriage service in which the groom is required to say, "With this ring I thee wed, and with all my worldly goods I thee endow, in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost," the spirit of dissent that animated the famous and fiery King asserted itself in his much tamer and more pacific grandson, and the young man said, "I don't want to say that." The clergyman explained that he must or the whole service would be of no avail. The bride looked pained and her mother looked stormy while the groom hesitated, and presently he said, moodily, "Well, I'll say it if I have to, but I don't believe it, and to say what you don't believe is a lie."

The Pithy Odes of Horace

Here is the latest from the Bohemian mart: Sam Shortridge rushes up to Horace Platt and exclaims, eagerly: "Horace, have you heard my last speech?"

"No," replies Horace, "I wish to heaven I had."

Concerning Turkish Consul Hall

George Hall has been lying at death's door with a fever that rendered him unconscious for a time, but he is convalescent. I hear that the representative of the Ottoman Empire is shortly to add to his other decorations the Cross of the Legion of Honor. Mr. Hall's wedding day, by the way, is as yet unsettled, although no fiance could be more constant in his attentions. Miss Carroll receives letters from him every day, and has a collection of verses that it is a pity cannot be seen by other eyes than hers.

Doctor Kierstedt and his wife—Edith McBean that was—who have been at Fort Miley ever since their marriage last spring, will leave next week for Washington. Mrs. McBean will be one of the party, and expects to be away all winter.

A Sierra Club Dinner

A dinner was given last Tuesday evening, in honor of Mr. and Mrs. William E. Colby and Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Le Conte, by Mr. Bernard Pacheco Miller, Mr. Edward T. Parsons, Mr. H. F. Peart, Mr. C. P. Gooding and Mr. J. Arthur Elston. All are members of the Sierra Club. Mr. Elston is now Governor Pardee's executive secretary and he is taking an active interest in social affairs at the capital.

Mr. and Mrs. Alfred Tubbs have gone East and will shortly go abroad for a year's stay, which will include a trip to Egypt. Mrs. Tubbs, who was Miss Hager of Colusa, inherited a million at her father's death about a year ago.

A Pedagogue for Mare Island

For the first time in its history, the Mare Island Navy Yard is to have a full-fledged Professor of Mathematics, with gold-braid attachment, on its staff of officers, Professor T. J. J. See, U. S. N., having just been ordered to duty at the observatory there. It is not every one that knows that the Navy includes in its staff corps the titles of Professor of Mathematics and Civil Engineer, the officers holding them, in spite of their anything but martial callings, being authorized, indeed required, to provide themselves with brass-bound uniforms, epaulettes, swords and all the other panoply of war. See is a comparatively recent addition to the Navy's scientific staff, having been but four years in the service. He is an astronomer of some note, although a young man, and has already achieved some fame not only in astronomy of the ordinary, garden variety, but in the higher realms of cosmology, in which the conclusions he reached from his observations were not always in strict harmony with generally accepted theories. He has hitherto been on duty at the Naval Observatory in Washington, and at the Naval Academy.

An Energetic Naval Surgeon

Surgeon John M. Edgar, of the Navy, who has just been ordered to the battleship Wisconsin, is a medical officer well known for his deep devotion to his profession. Too many naval surgeons, assured of a fixed and growing income for life, take things easy and content themselves with a rather perfunctory performance of their duties, attending to them with just enough zeal to satisfy the naval regulations. Not so with Edgar. He has always been an enthusiast and always eager, when in foreign parts, to spend his time ashore in the study of hygienic conditions, the diseases of their inhabitants, and the cases at their hospitals. He was on Dewey's ship in the Mediterranean some years ago, and was the surgeon of the Marine battalion which captured Guantanamo, Cuba, during the Spanish war.

Promotion No Longer Slow

The rapidity of promotion in the Marine Corps of the present day, as contrasted with its stagnation during the long period preceding the Spanish war, is strikingly illustrated by the cases of Major-General Charles Heywood, the late commandant, who has just been retired, and that of Brigadier-General George F. Elliott, who succeeds him. Heywood entered the service in 1858, and made his way to the front by long, soul-trying years of patient waiting. Elliott entered in 1870, and was still a captain in 1898, when he took part in the spirited capture and plucky holding of Guantanamo, Cuba, by the marine battalion. He has gone from the captaincy to the general's grade and the command of the corps in four years. During the same period, plenty of youngsters have been advanced from second-lieutenancies to captaincies.

Gallant Lieutenant Standley

The little gunboat Petrel, one of the earliest of the "New" Navy, and a member of Dewey's famous Manila bay squadron, has just been placed again in commission, and I note among the officers ordered to her, Lieutenant W. H. Standley, recently of the training-ship Adams. Standley is one of the most promising of the younger officers in the service. Perhaps I should not say promising, for he has already made good the promise of earlier years. It was he who, when detailed to act as lookout between ship and shore at the time of Lieutenant Gilmore's ambush and capture in the Philippines, stuck to his post, in company with but one man, hour after hour, surrounded by the enemy, until all chance of even one of Gilmore's party escaping had vanished, when he and his companion reluctantly obeyed the recall to the ship. His other service in the islands was strikingly meritorious. With the exception of a brief tour of shore duty in the Branch Hydrographic Office in this city, Standley has been almost continuously at sea since his graduation from Annapolis. Like all men with the real stuff in them, he is extremely modest and reticent about his own gallant deeds.

Lieutenant Martin, whose marriage at Nagasaki with Miss Mabel Wood I recently mentioned, is regarded as a great lady-killer in Manila. At one time, so say the gossips, he had five matrimonial engagements to his credit. Miss Wood was a school teacher, one of the many who went to the Philippines at the first call for recruits to teach the young Filipino idea how to shoot. She is uncommonly pretty and attractive.

Wake! For the Sun who scattered into flight
The Stars before him from the Field of Night
Drives Night along with them from Heav'n, and strikes
The Sultan's Turret with a shaft of Light.

—OMAR KHAYYAM.

Awake! Forever shall the Liar, Night,
With darkening creeds, like curtains, screen the Light?
Draw back the curtains, and let in the Dawn!
Wake for the Sun who scattered into flight

All mocking shadows, and the mists that blight,
And blinking shapes that grope with purblind sight,
Cow'ring before the Victor's shafts that drive
The Stars before him from the Field of Night.

Too long we've given Allah likes, dislikes;
And stemmed his Ocean with our shallow dykes:
His Ocean spreads, his Sun drives Error's stars;—
—Drives Night along with them from Heav'n, and strikes

With "whirlwind Sword" the rear ranks in the flight—
The Priests, and Moollahs, preaching Wrong for Right—
Blind Bats, and Owls! They scatter as he smites
The Sultan's Turret with a Shaft of Light.

Before the phantom of false Morning Died,
Methought a Voice within the Tavern cried:
"When all the Temple is prepared within,
Why nods the drowsy Worshiper outside?"

Before the Morn, that now spreads pinions wide,
Its semblance—Subhi Kazib—to us lied:
But Subhi Sadik's crow dispelled the Bat
Before the phantom of False Morning died.

Uneasily the City changed its side,
Once more to sleep addressed, and tried, and tried:
But, as the purple deepened in the East,
Methought a Voice within the Tavern cried:

"Better the Tavern's loud hilarious din,
The well-known Sinner than the Secret Sin!
Why should the True Believer hesitate,
When all the Temple is prepared within?

"He thinks of Fame?—a Phantom deified!
Of wealth? or Power?—troubles that abide!
Why, when the Table blushes ruby wine,
Why nods the drowsy Worshiper outside?"

In Financial Circles

The spell of dullness so long prevailing at "The Stock and Bond Exchange" continued unbroken during the past week. Transactions in various bonds aggregating $119,000 and $16,000 in United States bonds and in stocks sales amounted to 345 shares Gas and Electric, 362 shares Spring Valley Water Company, 300 shares miscellaneous and 710 shares of Sugar stocks.

The coming municipal election is undoubtedly exercising an unfavorable influence on public utilities. The Geary-street bond issue for the acquirement of the road by the city having met with decisive defeat, the attitude of the Board of Supervisors in the matter of the sale of a new franchise is awaited with considerable interest.

Sugar shares remain dull and inactive, though reports from the plantations are quite encouraging, and dividends on most of them may be confidently looked for in the near future.

The Contra Costa Water Company has passed its monthly dividend. The Financier.

The ability to properly pronounce every name on a fashionable menu is a true but severe test of cosmopolitanism. Those who aspire to be entirely up-to-date in these matters often accept coaching from a faithful waiter. The encroachment of the French language upon the English where food and drink are concerned still continues. New and almost unpronounceable dishes are of daily occurrence and several wines have been lately added to the lists. One of these is Ayala. The traveled pronounce this without difficulty, for in England and on the continent it is the champagne of the connoisseur. According to the highest authority, Ayala is pronounced as though it were spelled i-yol-la.

The Star of "Soldiers of Fortune"

Bob Edeson dates his success from his term of service at the Boston Museum, where, during a revival of "Our Boys," he was discovered by Charles Frohman. Though his present play deals with "Soldiers," it is not punctuated with pistol practice. In fact there is only one shot fired during the play's action, and that kills a man in the third act. But when Thomas originally arranged the drama, there were more pistol shots, and Mr. Edeson had to do some brisk talking to have them cut out. To illustrate his point he told one of his own experiences in ultra-realistic stage warfare. It was in a battle scene calculated to raise the roof, and it came pretty near doing so. There were supers without number on the stage, and each one of them had a gun with instructions to shoot. Beside these guns there were cannon and a rapid-fire gun, whose performance was "featured." Well, the time to shoot came and everybody shot. The din was bad enough, but it wasn't a circumstance to the smoke that quickly filled the stage and poured into the theatre. The supers couldn't see the signals of their leaders, so they kept on firing as long as the blank cartridges held out. The audience couldn't see the stage, and hardly knew when the curtain dropped. They cheered, however, and the curtain was raised, the only thing in sight being a very fair imitation of a London fog. The thrilling stage picture was wholly obscured. The battle scene was the climax of the third act, but the smoke lasted throughout the rest of the play, which was acted before a house that gasped, gurgled and coughed incessantly. And that's why Mr. Edeson objects to target practice on the stage.

Helene Montrose, late of Fischer's, has just declined a most tempting offer with the "Florodora" company. Manager Ryley hopes to secure her for a New York production later in the season.

On Wednesday evening Miss Carrie Sheuerman, a pupil of Hugo Mansfeldt, gave a piano recital in Maple hall, too late for review this week.

THE STAGE

An Alcazar Triumph

The Alcazar's new stock company has the true histrionic ring. It is an aggregation of talent that attests the perspicacity of Manager Price, who went East some months ago to round up a band of mummers capable of standing the severe test of a stock season. He did not look for them in Broadway, where the actor folks strut impressively, flaunt their laurels and dream of their glorious achievements in the calcium's white light. He was in quest of histrions spurred by ambition, who regard Broadway as the Mecca of their hopes, and whose accumulation of press notices is yet incomplete. To learn to what extent his search was rewarded go to the Alcazar. I should also advise you to go while "Lady Bountiful" holds the boards. "Lady Bountiful" is by Pinero, and it affords excellent opportunity for study in the evolution of a playwright. Pinero is today the most brilliant of English-writing dramatists. His up-to-date work is noted for its exquisite finesse, for its thumb-touch delicacy, its subtlety and its piqueing dialogue. It deals principally with sex problems, with scenic transcripts of conditions that bespeak the demoralization of polite society. "Lady Bountiful" is one of his earlier works, and it was written before the cunning playwright drifted into the habit of appealing to the lovers of salacity. It is a play of homely sentiment, and it is marred by conditions of construction, but it abounds in heart interest, and it contains many scenes of genuine dramatic feeling. It shows every evidence of painstaking workmanship. There is an occasional weary waste of words, but there is no paucity of action. The torch of Pinero's genius sputters at times, but infrequently. On the whole, it glows luminously. It is evident that the author was intent upon ranging before his audience a series of distinctly drawn characters, and in this he is most successful. He gives you in this play vital men and women, and their personalities are interesting. There is a strong touch of Dickens in some of them, and there is not one who is without a purpose in the development of the plot. The character of Roderick Heron is a gem. It is that of the spendthrift parent, careless of the future, firm in the belief that his rich relatives owe him a living; an utterly worthless individual, as heartless as an adventuress, as simple as a wayward child; a man utterly irresponsible. This part is played by John B. Maher, one of the cleverest character actors that we have seen for a long time. He is a notable acquisition to the Alcazar's stock. His personality dominated every scene, and he made the character stand out with cameo distinctness. Two other extremely well-drawn characters of the Dickensonian type are those of John Veale and his wife. They are of subordinate interest, but they are of the flesh-and-blood variety of stage humans. That veteran actor, George Osbourne, played Veale, and he did not seem to be acting at all. He was the part. I have frequently seen him as George Osbourne when he was supposed to be impersonating quite a different character, but in this play he is John Veale to the life, and there is not an Osbourne mannerism to produce a jarring note. Marie Howe has the quaintness of Mrs. Veale, but she is too vociferous. A little shading would help out. She should remember that the acoustics of the Alcazar are good. I have no intention of overlooking the leading members of the company, though it must be said that Miss Adele Block did not grip her audience sufficiently to insure recollection. However, that is not her fault. The character of Camilla Brent is one in which even a Bernhardt could scarcely hope to enthrall. It is hard to sympathize with a woman who loses her lover as she did, and then tries to win him back when he has fallen in love with another. Besides, just in the climax of the play, the Pinero third act, interest shifts to Margaret Veale, who has become the wife of the hero. She is all there is to the act, barring the clock whose ominous sound is the sombre accompaniment of her passing into the shadow of death. And this is the act in which Pinero gives you the thrill which is guaranteed with every Pinero package. In the preliminary scenes of this act you are bored. You feel that the great promise of the first two acts is not to be fulfilled; the sentimentality of it is weak, and you look for the curtain to fall with a thud, when suddenly you sit up and take notice. You are under the thrall of the master dramatist. It is only a death scene, but it grips you. The clock is the artistic feature of it, but Miss Frances Starr rounds out the absorbing charm of it. She is an artist of temperament and talent. Her performance is superbly realistic. Miss Block has the last act, the scene in the church, and proves herself to be a very capable actress. She is skilled in repose, she is handsome and she knows how to dress. Above all, she gives a womanly, tender and inexpressibly sad portrayal. The new leading man, James Durkin, is a robust chap, well mannered and with a well-modulated voice. There is not an episode in the play that he fails to grasp, and there is not the slightest touch of artificiality in his work. The performance on the whole is a triumph for the Alcazar. Not one member of the company detracts from the smoothness of the performance, though the staginess of Mr. Butler is a bit annoying. Even Eleanor Gordon, in the part of the serving maid, scores a hit, and the mounting of the play is most creditable. There is not a detail slighted, and in the last act the church scene is a delightful setting, full of atmosphere and impressive in its solemnity. In this scene the Episcopal church marriage service is introduced, the surpliced choir preceding the bride and groom to the altar, where the minister awaits them. The singing of "Oh, Promise Me" by a boy soprano is an incident which contributes not a little to the enjoyment of the performance.

After Pinero—Fitch

The Alcazar, absolutely unique among the stock houses of America, has taken another tremendous stride forward in the triumph of the new stock company. It is such a company as one would expect to find in a high-class New York production, and it brings with it the style, manner and atmosphere of Broadway. "Lady Bountiful" will be followed Monday by Clyde Fitch's buoyant and at times highly dramatic comedy drama of Western life, "The Cowboy and the Lady." It is the story of a Harvard lad who becomes a Colorado cowboy, and the beautiful, well-bred woman of fashion who is fettered by wretched alliance. Its pictures of mountain pass and dance hall and country court house, with its tense, tight-strung episode of trial for life, are fascinating in freshness and unconventionality, and as playwright below the conventional mere dramatic base. The piece centers on Mr. Goodhue and Theresa Knox, but as James Young and Alice Fleet Sylvester assist with the talented daughter of the latter. Jane Cowl's power has been as the sensational half-breed Indian. Marie Shotwell interprets the piano player of the Same Old Joint with delightful naïveté keeping, while Miss Fletcher Locke carries a third leg triumphant for the part played. The performance throughout is complete. I hope we may have it to be followed by a period of comedy.

"A Midnight Bell"

The [illegible] Harry Lindsay has had no part in the awakening of interest in his farce comedies and the exact [illegible] Lindsay is wisely [illegible] at the Central theatre. The popularity of Mr. Lindsay's many sketches is nothing remote [illegible] that those fellow-players are out of date, the acting is likewise out of [illegible]. "A Midnight Bell" is not one of the farces written to mirror a passing craze. It is still full of life and comedy to interesting type-[illegible] have used it in bygone times. Something, of course, of this interest is due to the admirable manner in which it is staged and played. It is a good, strong company that presents the Hoey comedy this week. The part of Beverly Lennox, [illegible] was created by Stockwell in the original production, and he still retains his mastery and successors in the role. Miss Lawton is the school teacher and I warrant the part has never been better played. Millar Kerr as Martin Talbot, Ward as the [illegible] Flower as the [illegible] Sturgeon as the irascible [illegible] Miss Woodthorpe as the old maid, and Miss Vane as the new [illegible] with Harrington, late of the Nell company, has a small part which she renders with considerable interest. The scenery in the last "A Midnight Bell" has [illegible] set as in the city. The [illegible] are clean cut, the costumes appropriate, and the [illegible] sound sufficient for classic comedy.

CATHRINE COUNTISS

Cathrine Countiss, the talented Eastern actress who will appear as Glory Quayle in "The Christian" at the [illegible] House the week beginning with tomorrow's matinee.

FRANCES STARR

The [illegible] of Frances Starr in the part [illegible] in "Lady Huntley" at the Grand [illegible] the theory that one must begin at the foot of the ladder. Absolutely without experience, two years ago, she made her bow to the stage in "Nobody's Widow" in her native city, Boston. Before the end of the week she had been advanced to the principal ingenue role, which was taken away from an experienced actress. Since then she has played in her respective company, the honors not now distributed, Murray Hill stock of New York, where, during a three years' stay, she played scores of leading ingenue roles in melodies, farces and dramas of sentiment. She has the potent and appealing gift of tears.

McIvor Tyndall and Invisible Forces

[illegible] I heard to remark that "Dr. McIvor-Tyndall was destined to smooth over the rough places left by the onslaught of the late Ingersoll." The remark was particularly apropos. Tyndall has the peculiar faculty of expressing the most unorthodox views in a manner that does not offend those who do not hold similar ideas of life. There is an air of sincerity, of sympathy and tolerance about the telepathist. "The Thought that Kills" proved one of the most attractive of the series, every seat being taken, and many standing. The experiments on "Jones" made more of a character calculated to strengthen the convictions of those who had witnessed the marvels performed on other occasions. It is possible that Tyndall will give his psychic impressions of the coming election on the occasion of his lecture and entertainment tomorrow (Sunday). Tyndall will take for the subject of his discourse, "Money: the Psychic law Governing it." On Sunday evening, October twenty-fifth, the subject will be "The World Invisible." There will be further manifestations of psychic power following the lecture.

Our Italian Visitors

How few of us out here on this edge of the continent ever reflect on our good fortune in being afforded an opportunity every year to hear the standard operas. Greatly are the music lovers of the city indebted to the Tivoli for what it is doing for them. This week "Mignon" is alternating with "I'Pagliacci" and "Cavalleria Rusticana." In the first named Cleo Marchesini has the title role, and in it does the best work she has done this season. Her voice and general style are too heavy for the part, but the music brings out some of her best notes, which she makes the most of. Unfortunately, she was not becomingly gowned for the part. Tromben sang the role of Felina brilliantly and acted with charming vivacity. Miss Eugenia Barker was obliged to repeat her solo Monday night. She has a facile mezzo soprano and uses it effectively. Tina de Spada scores as Nedda in "Pagliacci." Indeed the opera is most effectively sung throughout. Gregoretti was especially felicitous as Tonio, and was given more than one ovation. "Cavalleria" was a trifle out of joint.

The prettiest feature of the "Cleopatra" burlesque at the Grand is the minuet danced by the children in the first act. If everybody may not approve of Bothwell Browne's female impersonations, they all concur in awarding him the palm as a maitre de ballet. There is nobody here who can excel him in arranging harmonious color effects in costumes and limelight, and the rhythmic measures of a ballet. That play Charlotte Thompson wrote for Florence Roberts, "Silver-Mounted Harness," would have lacked one of its most attractive effects had the "Storm Cotillion" been omitted. It was Bothwell Browne who arranged the cotillion scene and coached the actors and actresses who took part in it. There's a pretty storm ballet in the "Cleopatra" production. The burlesque is sufficing to fill out the week, and will probably draw large crowds at the final matinee, for the children always enjoy anything in which other juveniles are the moving spirits.

Those Critical Sunday Nighters

The regular Sunday night patrons of the Orpheum constitute a distinct element of the community. They are vaudeville connoisseurs, and woe be it to the man or woman who appears before them for the first time and fails to "make good." Those Sunday night patrons flatter themselves that they know a good thing in the vaudeville line as soon as they see it, and they seldom fail to express their judgment vociferously. Consequently strangers on the Orpheum circuit are always nervous on their first appearance in this city. However, I have come to the conclusion that the Orpheum critics know a great deal more about sketch teams, low comedians, acrobats, and grotesque song and dance artists than they do about any of the higher forms of art. It's the occasional midweek audience that gives art its due. Last Sunday night I heard one of the most talented vocal artists that ever made his appearance on the local vaudeville stage, sing at the Orpheum, and I saw him leave the stage without getting a hand from more than three people in the audience. I refer to Mr. Wallace Brownlow, an English baritone, formerly of the D'Oyle Carte company of London, a man who frequently awoke thunders of applause in the Savoy theatre, and who is as great a favorite as Melba in Australia. Mr. Brownlow has a resonant baritone of golden quality, and his singing is of the most artistic character, but those Sunday night patrons had never heard of him, and though he sang three charming numbers, he failed to spring a mawkish ballad, or a rollicking ditty, and he was therefore unappreciated. When he has had a little more experience in vaudeville he will know that the song is the thing, and that it must be a certain style of song, and that the voice and art are considerations of less moment.

ELLEN BURG

It was in "Incog," the brilliant comedy by Mrs. Pacheco, that Miss Ellen Burg, who will be seen at the Columbia theatre next week in the supporting company of Mr. Robert Edeson, made her first appearance in America and her debut on the English-speaking stage. In Germany Miss Burg had occupied a position similar in many ways to that now held in this country by Miss Maude Fealey, the youngest leading woman on the American stage.

J. S. DUSS

J. S. Duss, the famous musician, who will conduct the New York Metropolitan Opera House orchestra at the Alhambra theatre October 27th, 28th, 29th, 30th.

The charity fund of San Francisco Lodge, T. M. A., will have a benefit at the Alhambra next Friday afternoon, at which talent will appear from all the theatres. The music will be one of the strong features, and several of the scenes will be set and struck in full view of the audience by members of the lodge.

Features of Next Week's Bills

The "Florodora" company will say good-bye at the Columbia at tomorrow night's performance. There is a large advance sale for Robert Edeson's engagement in "Soldiers of Fortune," the play Augustus Thomas wrote from Richard Harding Davis's popular novel. In the star's support are Ellen Burg, Dorothy Tennant, Harry Harwood and other sterling actors.

"The Christian," with a new Glory Quayle (Miss Cathrine Countiss) will be the Grand's attraction. Asa Lee Willard, an Eastern actor of reputation, will be seen as John Storm, and the other people in the cast will be Allan St. John, Arthur Lane, W. B. Fredericks, Nicholas Cogley, Frederick Esmelton, Charles Edwin Inslee, Edwin J. Kadow, Thomas De Laney, Winena Bridges, Charlotte Hammer, Hazel Kilday, Efilena Blair, Paula Herbert and Marie Horton. At the Sunday matinee, October twenty-fifth, the farce comedy, "Spotless Town," will be produced, with Leslie Morosco and Lelia Shaw in the leading characters.

"The Cowboy and the Lady" will be the second offering of the new Alcazar stock.

"The Paraders" appears to be in for a long run at Fischer's. "Rubes and Roses" will follow. Fischer's will have the new patent self-folding opera chairs in their private boxes in a few days.

Meredith's border drama, "Ranch 10," with its sensational plot, dressed in clever and often humorous dialogue, will please the Central's patrons. Stockwell will have the capital role of "the little sawed-off Judge from Cheyenne," who manufactures laws to suit his prejudices and interprets the same way. The scenery will be superb, and the storm in the Rockies will be a magnificent stage effect, while the cast will embrace all the Central favorites.

"La Boheme" has scored such a success that it will be repeated at the Tivoli on Monday, Wednesday, Friday and Saturday nights with the same cast. Tuesday night is set for the "Verdi night," when selections will be given from Aida, Rigoletto, Trovatore, Forza del Destino, Nabucco and Traviata. On Thursday and Sunday evenings and Saturday matinee the opera will be Giordano's "Andre Chenier," which was produced here for the first time last season. Ischierdo will have the title role and Gregoretti the great part of Girard.

The new people at the Orpheum will be the Waterbury brothers and Tenney, musical comedians, who reappear after a long absence in "A Cold Day in July"; "Whistling Tom Browne," who piped his way into popularity as the bartender in Hoyt's "Trip to Chinatown"; Herbert Lloyd, comedy juggler, known as "The King's Jester," assisted by Lillian Lilyan, who appear in this city for the first time. Brownlow will sing "On the Road to Mandelay," the toreador song from "Carmen," and "Skylark," by Arthur Leonard; the Golden Gate quartet and Fanny Winfred will have a new act.

At the Chutes will be the Yerxas, contortionists, and the Freeze brothers, tambourine manipulators and solo dancers. Trask and Rogers, black-face comedians, will change their specialty, John Tierney, the "modern Irishman," Allan Wightman and May Lamson will remain.

If She Wouldn't Sing

Though Isadore Rush of the "Florodora" company has all the style of a New Yorker born, she does not really hail from that State. She was born in Wilkesbarre, Pennsylvania. She is the daintiest and most stylish little woman that has yet appeared here in musical comedy, but it is unfortunate that she does not recite her songs from beginning to end. Occasionally she breaks out vocally, and the effect is far from pleasant. She emits sounds that distress the ear. Equally unpleasant is the singing of the Dolores of the present "Florodora" cast, but though I have heard five different women in that role—two in New York and three in this city—I have yet to hear one capable vocalist or competent actress. The part of Dolores is an important one. It is the prima donna role, that of Lady Holyrood being a soubrette part, but it has never been put into competent hands in this country. The woman who played it in London made a tremendous hit. We have yet to see the prettiest musical comedy of late years produced by a company of competent artists.

Morgan and Helen

Just a few short months ago the Rialto gossips were discussing the marriage of E. J. Morgan and Gretchen Lyons, the divorced wife of Lucius Henderson, Florence Roberts's leading man. And now comes the news that Morgan has taken another wife, in Windsor, Canada, none other than dashing, fascinating Helen Bertram. This is the fair Helen's third matrimonial venture, by the way, not to speak of her little love affair with George d'Essauer who ruined himself for her. Her first husband was the musical director of the Emma Abbott opera company. Miss Bertram was a chorus girl then but later she became prima donna of the Duff opera company, and later still of the Bostonians. Her second husband was the very much lamented, gifted "Teddy" Henley. Poor Henley dissipated himself to death, and his widow refused to be consoled. She had his body cremated and wore the ashes in a jeweled receptacle, dependent from her neck, the way camphor bags were used years ago to prevent contagion from small-pox. She said she would wear her poor husband's ashes to her dying day. But one day in San Francisco she and the admiring D'Essauer were out at the Cliff House. The prima donna, to prove the quality of her love for her companion, drew the receptacle with its precious burden from her bosom and cast it into the sea. Morgan, Miss Bertram's newest husband, is credited with a temperament and predilections similar to those of "Teddy" Henley. He puts the same intensity of passion into his acting, and possibly that is what attracted Miss Bertram to him. When his late wife—the one before Gretchen Lyons—divorced him, it was said Morgan was addicted to dope, but later it appeared that the wife, not E. J. Morgan, was the morphine fiend. But Morgan is a very eccentric fellow, and he is said to talk to himself a great deal, on and off the stage. He has played in San Francisco many times, his best work being as Defarges in "The Only Way" and as John Storm in "The Christian." Miss Bertram's latest role was the widow in "The Prince of Pilsen." She, by the way, is the devoted mother of a young daughter, the child of her first husband.

Landers Stevens and Georgie Cooper made such a hit in their Fresno engagement that they are arranging for a return date in the raisin city. Stevens's acting was likened by one critic to that of Henry Miller. When Landers Stevens and Georgie Cooper were married, their intention was to go East, but they stopped in Oakland.

A Treat for the Sex

In "Her Own Way," the new play which Clyde Fitch has written for Maxine Elliott, that lovely lady "does" her hair, "right out on the stage," as Chimmie Fadden would say. What an object lesson to the wilderness of conventionally coiffed women who have tried to fathom the method of doing up that black satin hair. However, Miss Elliott's style of coiffure is not likely to be copied extensively, because it is seldom a head so beautiful is created to wear a style so simple and classic.

Rosabel Morrison, step-daughter of Florence Roberts and daughter of Rose Wood, is now playing the leading role in "The Deserted Bride" in the East. She is said to resemble greatly her beautiful mother.

Automobile Topics

Messrs. L. P. Lowe, N. J. Messer Jr., E. Courtney Ford, Sam Buckbee, E. P. Brinegar and C. A. Hawkins, the committee in charge of the Automobile Club of California's race meeting, which is to take place on the Ingleside track November sixth and seventh, have about completed arrangements for the event. Every effort is being exerted to make the affair a notable sporting event. Besides a number of Eastern racing machines which will be shipped out here especially for this meet, two of the most daring automobile racers in the United States are to take part. Barney Oldfield, the premier racer, will surely be here for the great event. W. G. Cunningham, the well-known auto racer of Detroit, and the only one who made Oldfield taste defeat, is due here in about two weeks. He will enter the races, but in what sort of a car is not yet known. The following telegram received by the Pioneer Automobile Company from Barney Oldfield in Cleveland this week signifies the intention of the latter to journey West: "Ship both machines from here twelfth by freight. Prizes must be cash as per Shank's wire." Two thousand five hundred dollars will be appropriated for purses, with many fine cups for second places, and not a few special prizes are to be offered by individuals. Two hundred and fifty dollars has already been offered for the fastest mile during the two days of racing below the one-minute mark. The programme of events which has been arranged includes fourteen races, seven each day, and also a five-mile handicap for motor cycles each day. Work has commenced on the track, which, no doubt, will be as smooth as marble for the event. Of course many of the large motor vehicles are to be brought from the East, but the Coast will be represented also by several big cars, such as George Whittell's Mors, a Mercedes and a Panhard. Harold B. Larzelere, manager of the Pacific Motor Car Company, left the early part of the week for the East. He will have sent out a special racing Cudell and Packard, both of which cars, he says, he will drive in the races. Stock machines are all the White Sewing Machine Company will enter. Cuyler Lee of the Western Automobile Company will enter in his Cardillac, but does not intend to have a special racing machine sent out here.

The White touring cars were conspicuous last Sunday. J. A. Benson and a party of friends drove over the Fish Ranch road. Ellis Parrish had his White out, and W. J. Gorham was seen in his White horseless carriage. Leon Roos, Dr. Shields and Dr. Clow were some other autoists who had their Whites out for a run. John D. Spreckels, with a party, drove to Menlo in his White touring car, returning by way of the Mission road. Mr. Spreckels said that it was the worst road he ever saw in his life, and he doesn't see how he ever managed to get over it.

G. O. Heine, who has the agency for the Ford automobiles in this city, made a trip to Gilroy last week. Mr. Heine, accompanied by his family, left in a Ford last Friday evening a week ago for Monterey. The party left Oakland about 11:30 p. m., arriving in the Garden City at two o'clock Saturday morning. About 2 a. m. the journey was resumed, and at Gilroy a cloudburst prevented the automobilists from going on, and the return trip was at once begun.

The Autocar agency in San Francisco has opened up a new garage at 123 City Hall avenue, where the Autocar will be handled exclusively. The buyers of the autocar for the first week are Mrs. Claude Maze of Modesto, J. R. Burnham of Oakland, and C. S. Middleton of San Francisco. It is the intention of the company to build a three-story garage somewhere in the retail district.

Hanford, California, has recently been seized with the automobile fever, and four Ramblers were sold there last week by the National Automobile Company.

Charles B. Shanks of the Winton Motor Carriage Company of Cleveland left last Saturday for Los Angeles. The Easterner in an interview stated that his company had already booked up two hundred orders for 1904 machines. It would seem from this that the same trouble will be experienced next year as formerly: that of getting machines from the factory fast enough to supply the trade. Mr. Shanks says that this is not only true of the Winton factory, but of all the factories in the East which manufacture standard machines.

W. C. Robertson of the Edgemere hotel of this city has been spending considerable time lately touring this State in his Winton. Mr. Robertson expects to leave shortly on a trip overland in his auto to Spokane, Washington.

Fourteen Winton touring cars were counted last Sunday by a spectator who was amusing himself.

When Barney Oldfield comes to town he will no doubt be lionized and pedestaled. He is the hero of the auto world. He has had some very narrow escapes from death, but his seeming recklessness has never diminished. However, he is not as reckless as people imagine. He is daring, but he has a cool head and rare judgment. —The Chauffeur.

A Pedantic Poet

Frederick Milton Willis makes his bow to the public in a small volume of verse entitled "The City of Is and Other Poems." On a little printed slip inserted into the book and entitled "For the Courtesy of a Review," Mr. Willis rather deprecates his own effort, stating "that it is with considerable compunction that he ventures to invade the reviewer's time and attention." In these days of push and poster such modesty is, to say the least of it, refreshing. Mr. Willis is without doubt a young man, and his verse, like that of all youthful poets, is reminiscent. There is a little too much Poe in it, to give but one instance, particularly in the matter of refrain and metre. The resemblance is very apparent in the poems entitled "Through the Valley of Nil," "The Demon," "The Dawn of Hope." The poetry itself is not so much obscure as top-heavy, overweighted with learning. Mr. Willis would do well to forget the most of his psychology and philosophy, and his stock of dictionary words. These things do not stimulate the imagination of a poet, which, as a recent critic has said, "goes off at a touch and carries but a light charge of learning." Mr. Willis's poems do not sing, they lack inspiration, they are manufactured rather than created. There is but little poetic association in such phrases as "demiurgic efflux," "Rational Doubt," "paramount duty," "stratified rocks," "ultimate trend," "rational soul," "inchoate will," nor in such epithets as "mayavic," "gamutic," "hyaline" times—culled at random from Mr. Willis's pages. And what may be the meaning of this stanza?—

"But the gradient, paved with irradiant,
Vacuous violet light,
Had shrunk to a slender rill
Of fluctuant spirit, to the sight
Of the child in the Valley of Nil."

The stanzas entitled "Excess," a song from an unpublished romance, are strongly remindful of the old ditty:

'Oh, carry me down in the dark hole
And cover me up with charcoal."

They read:

"Bury me in a grave, oh,
And cover it over with snow, oh
For—a ha, ha, ha, and a ha, ha, ha,
This is too merry a world, oh!

"Carry me up on a cliff, oh,
And off of it heartily throw, oh,
For—a ha ha ha, and a ha, ha, ha,
This is too jolly a life, oh!"

And so on for a matter of four stanzas. This is poor stuff and has passed well over the borderland of the ridiculous. Mr. Willis could have spared it from his collection. Mr. Willis has many of the gifts of a poet. He has imagination, a sense of rhythm and color, a large vocabulary and sensitive thought and feeling. But there is too much head and too little heart in his writing; it breathes the aroma of dry books rather than of life; it lacks simplicity and directness. The book is neatly gotten out with a frontispiece by Ernest Peixotto. [For sale by Paul Elder, 238 Post street.]

Another Washington Story

In "The Congressman's Wife" John D. Barry has attempted to show Washington political society from the social standpoint. He has not succeeded very well, but neither has he altogether failed. He wants to emphasize the wide divergence which may exist between the private honesty of a politician in connection with his own affairs and his family, and the very different standard by which he is governed in public matters. For this he has taken a rising young lawyer of New York and sent him into the House of Representatives. Douglas Briggs is one of the kind who makes friends readily and, by managing to be just the right thing to every one, maintains his popularity. He is married and has two children, to whom he is devoted, and his wife is just the right woman for him. Briggs has, of course, practically to abandon his law practice, and he soon finds that his salary of five thousand a year is not a drop in his bucket at the rate he pleases to live, so he falls a ready victim to a lobbyist and thereafter he flourishes—until he is found out, and not having been a good party man he is snowed under at the next election. Meanwhile his wife, having discovered that he was taking bribes, does as wives do under such circumstances, and between his domestic frost and his political snowstorm Briggs, who is not inherently corrupt but rather the victim of circumstances, comes to himself and makes a new start. Mr. Barry deals altogether with Douglas Briggs. He takes it for granted, and apparently he expects his readers likewise, to believe that Helen Briggs is upright and incorruptible, but it is rather difficult to reconcile her complacent acceptance of the good things with her common sense and experience. She was the child of a country clergyman who sent his sons to college and kept his daughter at home on eight hundred a year, and when she married Douglas he was in receipt of an annual income of one thousand dollars, so she must have had a pretty accurate idea of just how far one hundred cents could be spread. Yet we find her living in a house which is the envy of Washington society, keeping a retinue of servants, a carriage and horses and other accessories, dressing to suit her position and giving entertainments which cast two thousand dollars, knowing all the time that her husband's income was his salary. In addition there was a country home and a city house in New York. How could she, or any other woman, rising from her narrow circumstances, help knowing that when the living expenses ran above thirty thousand dollars a year and the available resources were about one-sixth of that, the difference must be made up by some underhand means? Farley, the newspaperman, is the best character in the book. Miss Wing is just a little too brazen for even a female blackmailer. The author has headed off comparison by contrasting his own work with that of Brand Whitlock in "The Thirteenth District." Mr. Barry shows promise of being able to do something better than he has accomplished this time. [Published by the Ess Ess Company.]

A Favorite with Tourists

Tourists, and out-of-town residents, coming to San Francisco for limited stays, have found their ideal stopping-place the Hotel Pleasanton. The central location of the hotel, convenient to so many car lines, is one of the reasons of its popularity with transient visitors. Then the splendid service, and the courteous attention accorded to each guest, have also proved potent factors of popularity. Manager de Wolfe has lately expended ten thousand dollars in improvements on the hostelry, and everything is of the very latest and newest. As a family hotel the Pleasanton has always maintained prestige above all other San Francisco hotels.

Ignorance of Booksellers

The enterprising manager of a clippings bureau recently addressed Laurence Sterne and John Ruskin, through the medium of publishers, being urged to activity through having seen notices of new editions of their works. He ought to go into partnership with the manufacturing jeweler who, in the height of the souvenir spoon fad, wrote to Miss Fanny Burney, in care of the Lippincotts, asking for photographs of some place of interest connected with her life which could be suitably engraved. One of the most astonishing things in connection with books and book selling is the amount of ignorance that can be absorbed by some of those who make their living by connection with them. It rarely happens that a clerk in charge of a book counter knows anything whatever of books except as commodities, and it is impossible to get any assistance in making selections. This is particularly the case in regard to juveniles. It is not an infrequent occurrence that people who have been out of touch with children's books for a generation are called upon to buy reading matter for the little folks, and they have nothing to fall back upon but those which were favorites in their own generation. Unless they adopt the comfortable doctrine that anything is good enough, they are in danger of making unwise selections out of pure ignorance. While one does not expect the book counter clerk to read everything and be a walking encyclopedia of general information, it does seem as if he could keep up as well with the qualities of his stock as do the dry goods clerk and shoe salesman.

Ruth McEnery Stuart's stories of Southern negro life are sympathetic and unique. She is neither a reformer nor an apologist, and she points no moral, but to read one tale is to pine for more. Who can forget Moriah, and the unique wedding gift of her second husband, a complete mourning outfit for his predecessor? And there was "Napoleon Jackson, the Gentleman in the Plush Rocker," whose mother providentially "marked him for rest," and so many before, and nothing in their line could be better. George Washington Jones is a homeless and friendless little black boy who recalls a story told him by his grandfather who, in the days "befo' the wah," had been given to "the loveliest mistress in all the world" as a Christmas gift, and the forlorn little son of freedom determines to make a Christmas present of himself to some lady who will fulfill his ideal. Now, who but Mrs. Stuart could think up such a situation, much less carry it to a conclusion without drowning the humor in maudlin sentimentality?

A NEW LAW

The Board of Commissioners in Optometry according to a new law enacted by the last Legislature, has issued a Certificate to Mr. George Mayerle, the German Expert Optician at 1071 Market Street, authorizing him to practice Optometry and prescribe glasses to those having weak eyes and poor sight. Mr. George Mayerle has probably prescribed glasses to more prominent men of the world than any other optician in this country. The fact that the highest U. S. Army, Navy and Government officials and most eminent clergymen, judges and educators of California are using his glasses should be sufficient evidence of his wonderful ability to treat most complicated cases with accuracy and absolute perfection.

Commander U. S. Navy. MARE ISLAND CAL., July 20, 1903. MR. GEORGE MAYERLE—Dear Sir: The eyeglasses you made for me are the most satisfactory pair I have had in the last thirty years. Check in payment is enclosed herewith. Very respectfully,
W. W. KIMBALL, Commander U. S. Navy.

The President of Santa Clara College. MR. GEORGE MAYERLE—Dear Sir: The glasses ordered came in good time. They are excellent and I am more than pleased with them. Yours very truly, ROBERT E. KENNA, S. J.

Office Chief of Police. It gives me much pleasure to recommend to the public, Mr. George Mayerle, of San Francisco. I have been using glasses for the past four years, and during that time have consulted several opticians, but not until I had consulted Mr. George Mayerle and had him fit glasses to my eyes did I get entire satisfaction. Respectfully, J. H. ANDERSON, Sergeant of Police.

Admiral Dewey, who used George Mayerle's glasses during the Spanish-American war, and is still using them with much satisfaction, highly recommends Mr. George Mayerle, and sends the following testimonial: MR. GEORGE MAYERLE—My Dear Sir: I am still using with much satisfaction the glasses you sent me at Manila; also the new ones suit my eyes perfectly. Yours very truly, GEORGE DEWEY.

The Rolker Recital

A Patti audience greeted Mr. Edward Xavier Rolker's pupils at their song recital of last week. Standing room only was the rule, and the display of toilettes would have done justice to a Grau affair. It was the first public appearance here of Miss Maud Goodwin, who returned from abroad last fall to continue her work with Mr. Rolker. Miss Goodwin has a most attractive stage presence and a brilliant and flexible voice, two qualities which should argue for her success in light opera, the career which she has chosen. Her two groups of songs were received with enthusiasm. She was at her best in Chaminade's "Summer" and the Viardot-Chopin "Aime-Moi." I did not care for "Elizabeth's Prayer." No singer can be equally good in everything and this was out of her genre. The recital opened auspiciously with Schubert's beautiful "Coronoch," the ensemble work of Misses Goodwin, Judson and Wheeler being almost perfect. Miss Goodwin looks like a prima donna, and, as was evident after her first solo, sings like one, too—with a dash that is delightful. The voice is not all velvet, but one hears it gladly; it is refreshing, heart-finding. Miss Mignon Judson, who was styled on the program a mezzo-contralto, is a beautiful young woman with a face like a cameo and a voice to correspond. She has a pure and sympathetic organ and a sweetly serious manner. She was delightful in Grieg's "Princess," in her two Willeby numbers, and in Beach's "June.' For an encore she gave the old favorite "The Kerry Dancing" which I have never heard better done. Three cardinal virtues—temperament, artistic reserve, and moving quality in the middle register—characterize her singing. With but one exception—Willeby's "Cuttin' Rushes"—all her numbers had the added charm of things happily chosen, through which personality has a fair chance of making itself felt. Miss Gertrude Wheeler has some lovely notes in her contralto, but she lacks life. She did not really show what she is capable of until her two last numbers, Rubinstein's "Der Asra" and her encore "Three Little Green Bonnets." Miss Wheeler's voice is velvet throughout; but well sung as her songs are, they fail to suggest the repressed fire that should burn in the soul of the singer. A little more feeling would make them much more effective. The Toreador Song was not a very happy selection for Mr. Carl Yoho. In English it is almost invariably bellowed; it should be sung in Italian. There is promise in Mr. Rosborough's voice. The "Sword Song," however, was a little beyond him. Miss Janes is a most sympathetic accompanist.

Under the direction of Mr. C. Ernest Edwards, a series of classical concerts has been arranged to be given this season in Hearst hall, Berkeley. The first, which occurred on Wednesday evening, will be more fully mentioned next week. The participants were Edward W. Tillson, the New York pianist, Mrs. Grace Davis Northrup, soprano, Mrs. Grace Carroll Elliott, contralto, and Hother Wismer, violinist.

Miss Morgan's Recital

Miss S. Isabel Morgan's studio lecture on song interpretation proved to be a very able exposition of the subject. She was also particularly fortunate in her pupil, Mrs. Lillian Werth Fruhling, who rendered songs by Scarlatti, Mozart, Mendelssohn, Purcell, Schumann, and more modern composers. Mrs. Fruhling has a clear and pure voice, a good method, and a rare gift of expression. Her versatility as an artist made her equally successful in many different kinds of song. Her interpretation of Scarlatti's "Violette" came very close to Trebelli's rendering of the same. She was equally at home in Denza's spirited "Girls of Seville," in a chanson by Bemberg full of roulades and trills, in Schumann's "In a Foreign Land," and in two quaint little slumber songs by Liza Lehmann. The evening proved a highly enjoyable one for the lovers of song who were present. The next lecture and recital will be devoted to ballads.

The Carrington Pupil Recital

I thought the encore affliction had been forever banished, but at the recital given by Madame Abbie Carrington's pupils last Friday evening it was there in all its tedious variety. Not only one, but two and even three encores were the rule—a very bad rule. There is nothing added to an audience's enthusiasm by doubling and tripling a program in that way. There were eleven numbers on the program, two of which were piano solos by Mr. Emlyn Lewys, and the rest, songs by his wife's pupils. The best of them from a critical point of view were the aria "Vision Fair," from Massenet's "Herodiade" by Mr. Cecil Smith, and the songs "She Wandered Down the Mountain Side" (Clay) and "The Silver Ring" (Chaminade) by Miss Clara Lewys. Mr. Smith has a strong, resonant voice, and he brought out the dramatic side of the aria with excellent effect. Miss Lewys reminds one a bit of the late Mrs. Henschel. Her voice is not strong but is of pleasing quality, and her expression is refined and delightful. The audience seemed to prefer Mrs. Cora Hall, who gave the "Fors e lui" aria from "Traviata," for they demanded three recalls after her number. The other participants for the most part could not be fairly judged, their selections being too ambitious for their abilities. Had they chosen simpler songs, they would perhaps have been heard to better advantage. The hall was packed at this recital.

Mr. Otto Spamer, who did such fine solo work with Scheel's symphony orchestra, will give two concerts in Lyric hall next Wednesday evening and Saturday afternoon, under the direction of Mr. Shafter-Howard. He will be assisted by Mrs. M. E. Blanchard, Mrs. L. Snider Johnson and Fred Maurer Jr. The programme on Wednesday, at 8:15, will include the Paganini-Wilhelmj Concerto in D major, Romance and Polonaise by Wilhelmj, Chaconne by Bach, the Chopin-Sarasate Nocturne, op. 9, No. 2, and Wieniawski's "Air Russe." Mrs. Blanchard will sing compositions by Massenet, Brahms and Taubert. At the Saturday matinee Mr. Spamer will play numbers by Bruch, Wagner-Wilhelmj, Bach, Paganini-Wilhelmj and Wieniawski, and Mrs. Johnson will sing an aria from Bemberg's "Joan of Arc," and a group of English songs, two by Shafter-Howard. Mr. Spamer is a favorite pupil and a nephew of the great Wilhelmj. The patronesses of these concerts include Mesdames Tucker, Harrison, Goewey, Merrill, McLaren, Hearst, McKinstry, Davis, Ames, Day and Howard.

MISS CARRIE SHEUERMAN

Miss Carrie Sheuerman, Hugo Mansfeldt's brilliant young pupil, who made her debut at a piano recital on Wednesday evening in Maple hall.

Miss Augusta Cottlow, pianist, is possessed of marvelous technique, or, more correctly, is possessed by it. Her work is intellectual, not emotional, and music is nothing if not emotional—that is, it is very little. She has the mastery of a man, but she has not the delicacy of a man. The delicacy of a woman she has on occasion; and in art at least female fineness is inferior to male. In life it may be otherwise. In Miss Cottlow's playing there is something of the poet, much of the scientist. She woos you not at all; her touch does not caress the ear, and the applause she wins of you is for her power. To make a physical thing of music is to unmake it, to reduce it to noise. Technique is a means, the end of which is (in this case) music. To forget that is a common fault of skillful youth. Miss Cottlow is very skillful and very young. Such remarkable talent should produce more musical results. Her Bach was big, but it was not quite Bach. The like may be said of her Brahms. In the "Scherzo," and in the little encore, there was indeed Chopin—Chopin minus the poetry. The Liszt "Polonaise" was played almost perfectly, but then, as Oscar Wilde has it, Liszt is not quite the sort of young lady one would care to marry. Mr. Natorp Blumenfeld, the violinist, came in for a goodly share of the applause. He was heard at his best in the Haydn "Serenade" and the "Air Savoyard" (Vieutemps). His Bach, however, was not so happy. Of the Rubenstein trio, Miss Cottlow made a solo for the piano; the strings struggled to be heard—in vain. The accompanying of Mr. Fred Maurer was, of course, faultless. Wherever he plays there is music.

MME. LILLIAN NORDICA

Mme. Lillian Nordica, the world's greatest soprano, who will appear in conjunction with Duss and the orchestra of the Metropolitan Opera House at the Alhambra theatre October 27th.

Mr. Samuel Bollinger, two of whose compositions were rendered by Miss Cottlow at her Thursday recital, ranks among the leading American composers. His works are in the repertory of William H. Sherwood, the dean of American pianists, Miss Cottlow, Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler, Ernest Kroeger, Margarethe Schambe and others of like note. Mr. Bollinger's compositions are marked by great charm and delicacy and a distinctly scholarly style. Among them are a spirited Scherzo in B minor, a brilliant Mazurka in E flat minor, and a poetical Romanzo Lamentoso in B major, which were played for the first time in Leipzig at a Royal Conservatory concert, and were highly praised by the critics; three characteristic dances, full of originality and beauty; an Idyl, Barcarola and Humoreska of unique treatment; and a Sonnet which the composer dedicated to Fannie Bloomfield-Zeisler. The last is among the later works of Mr. Bollinger. The composer is a finished pianist, understanding all the technical points which his works so well illustrate.

Mr. Andrew Bogart has taken studios at 546 Sutter street, having decided to remain in San Francisco during the winter. He will accept a limited number of students desiring to study the method of singing as taught by the elder Lamperti. Mr. Bogart has been identified with Mr. Francis Stuart of New York for several years, and has had the advantage of spending several seasons in London, Paris, Berlin and Italy. He is the only representative of the Lamperti method of singing on the Pacific Coast, and the only exponent of Mr. Francis Stuart's method.

The interest of the local amateur musicians, young men and women, is at present centered in the successful organization of The Minetti Orchestra of San Francisco, a creditable symphony orchestra in which they are afforded rare opportunities and advantages never before offered. The organization realizes the long-expressed desire of the amateur for a substantial orchestra in which practical experience may be gained in the proper study and in the artistic performance of the best in music. Applications for membership may be addressed to Meredith Sawyer, the secretary of the orchestra, city P. O. box 2673.

A Big Musical Treat

The biggest event of the musical season will be the concerts by the complete orchestra of the "Metropolitant Opera House" of New York City, under the direction of that eminent conductor, Mr. J. S. Duss, and with Nordica, the great dramatic soprano, as one of the soloists. Mrs. Katharine Fisk, the contralto, and Nathan Franko the violinist, also accompany this great organization on the tour. The concerts will be given at the Alhambra, the first being on Tuesday night, October 27th, when Nordica will be the soloist. A fine program will be rendered, including Weber's "Invitation to the Dance" by Weingaertner, the march "With Pomp and Circumstance" composed for King Edward's coronation by Edward Elgar, the overture to Goldmark's "Cricket on the Hearth" and the introduction to "Parsifal." Nordica will sing two grand arias. Tuesday afternoon there will be a popular concert of excellent works, including the suite to "Lorna Doone" by Nevin, and solos by Mme. Katharine Fisk, and Franko the solo violinist. Thursday night's concert will be under the auspices of the Twentieth Century Music Club, when the public will hear one of the Richard Strauss Tone Poems "Don Juan." Strauss is said to paint tone pictures with the broad brush of the impressionist and in a most original and striking manner. Mme. Fisk will sing the beautiful aria, "Softly Awakens My Heart," from "Samson and Delilah," and a "Summer's Night," by Goring Thomas, with violoncello obligato by Mr. Paul Miersch. Nathan Franko the violin soloist will play "Theme and Variations" by Corelli. The same programme will be played at Stanford University on the Tuesday afternoon of the 27th. Friday matinee will be the farewell concert, and an immense programme will be rendered with Nordica and Franko as soloists. On Wednesday night the entire organization, with Nordica as soloist, will appear at the Macdonough theatre in Oakland. The sale of seats will begin on Wednesday morning at 9 o'clock, at Sherman, Clay & Co's, and Manager Greenbaum expects another Mascagni triumph. The orchestra is one of the best in the world, and the soloists also of the highest rank. The prices will range from $1.00 to $3.00, with special rates of from 50c. to $2.00 for the Wednesday "Pop," which will begin at 3:15 p. m. for the convenience of school children and teachers.

Following the Metropolitan Opera House Orchestra at the Alhambra, the "Ellery Royal Italian Band," which has made so many staunch friends on its previous visits here, will begin an engagement for one week only, opening Sunday, November 1st. The band will be stronger and better than ever, having been improved by the addition of a number of new soloists, and the clarinet section has been materially strengthened. The band has now an enormous repertoire, including selections from all the new Italian operas, such as "La Tosca," "Andre Chenier," etc., and the leader this year is claimed to be the greatest Italian bandmaster that has ever left Italy. His name is Chiaffarelli, and he is said to be fully as magnetic as Creatore was, and a much finer musician. Many of his compositions will be played during the season here. Popular prices will prevail.

I am told that the only two women's clubs in California that remunerate the musicians who take part in their programs are Adelphian of Alameda and the Saturday of Sacramento. How far this is correct, I have no means of ascertaining except by denials from the other clubs, but I am assured that it is the case. It scarcely seems possible that the wealthy San Francisco clubs should pay nothing to the instrumentalists and vocalists who contribute to their pleasure at the "open meetings," though perhaps the performers may consider themselves repaid by the honor of appearing before the cultured ladies.

A feature of "Ben-Hur" which has attracted a great deal of attention is the musical accompaniment which was provided by Edgar Stillman Kelley, Professor of Music in the College of New York, and a former resident of this city. The orchestration is rendered by twenty-four musicians. Mr. Kelley is considered the foremost authority on this side of the Atlantic on ancient and Oriental music. —The Music Critic.

Action brought in the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and the Complaint filed in the office of the Clerk of said City and County of San Francisco.

The People of the State of California send Greeting to:

A. C. Freese (Administrator of the Estate of Pierre Langaron (deceased), Eleanora O Salmon, Eleanora O. Salmon (as Trustee) Louise Emile Salmon, Francis Salmon, Alfred Salmon, Eleanora Alexandrina Salmon, Joseph Reavilo, also known as Jose Raviolo, otherwise known as Jose Raviola, Jean Marcellin Pourguery, Tomas Pidello, Guillaume Pache, Jean Pache, Gaspard Sadony, Eleanora O Salmon (Executrix of the Last Will of Francis Salmon, deceased) John Doe, Richard Roe James Black, Mary Green and Mary Doe, also all other persons unknown, claiming any right, title, estate, lien or interest in the real property described in the complaint adverse to Plaintiff's ownership, or any cloud upon Plaintiff's title thereto.

YOU ARE HEREBY DIRECTED to appear and answer in an action entitled as above, brought against you in the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, within ten days after the service on you of this Summons—if served within this County; or within thirty days if served elsewhere

And you are hereby notified that, unless you appear and answer as above required, the said Plaintiff will take judgment for any money or damages demanded in the complaint as arising upon contract or he will apply to the Court for any other relief demanded in this complaint.

That the property involved in and affected by said action is described as follows, to wit:

All that certain lot, piece or parcel of land, situate, lying and being in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, commencing at a point where the Northerly line of Union street intersects the Easterly line of Dupont street; thence running Easterly along said line of Union street Twenty-three (23) feet; thence at right angles Northerly Thirty-four (34) feet and four and one-half (4½) inches thence at right angles Westerly Twenty-three (23) feet to the said Easterly line of Dupont street, and thence Southerly and along said line of Dupont street Thirty-four (34) feet and four and one-half (4½) inches to the point of commencement.

That the object of said action is to obtain a judgment and decree of the above entitled Court adjudging and determining that the above named defendants and all other persons claiming any right, title, estate, lien or interest in the real property described in the plaintiff's complaint adverse to plaintiff's ownership or any cloud upon plaintiff's title thereto have not, and that none of them has any estate, right, title, lien or interest whatever in or to said real property, or in or to any part or parcel thereof, and that the title of plaintiff is good and valid, and that said defendants and all of said persons unknown as aforesaid be forever enjoined and debarred from asserting any claim whatever in or to said real property, or in or to any part or parcel thereof adverse to the plaintiff, and for such other, further and additional relief as to the Court may seem meet and proper in the premises, and for costs of suit.

ALFRED H. COATES Plaintiff, vs. EMMA C. COATES, Defendant.

Action brought in the Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and the Complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said Superior Court.

The People of the State of California send Greeting to:

EMMA C. COATES Defendant.

YOU ARE HEREBY REQUIRED to appear in an action brought against you by the above-named Plaintiff in the Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and to answer the Complaint filed therein within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this Summons, if served within this County; or if served elsewhere, within thirty days.

The said action is brought to obtain a judgment and decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony now existing between plaintiff and defendant, upon the ground of defendant's willful desertion of said plaintiff for more than one year prior to the commencement of this action and upon the ground of defendant's extreme cruelty to plaintiff as appears from the complaint on file herein to which special reference is hereby made; also for general relief, as will more fully appear in the Complaint on file, to which special reference is hereby made.

All of which will more fully appear in the Complaint on file herein to which you are hereby referred.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said Complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief therein demanded.

Human Nature

The final test of a man's character is the card table. Whatever there may be in him of weakness, whether it be a mean avarice, cowardice, or a deceitful disposition, will there inevitably appear. If I were the president of a bank, the general of any army, or the leader of any other great enterprise, I would make it a point to test the character of my subordinates in a series of games at cards, preferably played for money. It is the only sure test of character that the wisdom of the ages has been able to devise. —From "A Game of Cards," by W. C. Morrow.

The Problem

Dick Clay stared at the several letters that lay on his desk. He had read them all more than once, but in the last one lay the gist of the problem that confronted him. He read that one again, but still he could not make up his mind where his duty lay:

Mount Joy, June sixth.

Dear Dick,

Yes, it is lonely here without you. I sent you away, but that does not make my loneliness the less intense. Everything around here breathes memories of you—that dear week. How could you spoil it, Dick? Why don't men love the same as women do? Why can't they live in the ideal? Must they always intrude a discordant note? I never loved any man but you, dear, and I don't think anything could ever change my feelings toward you. I forgive you everything, but I never wish to look upon your face again. Why did you write, when I was trying to forget? Your letter brought it all back again, the bitterness of that last scene. I said it must be farewell—and it shall be. I am going away, Dick, somewhere where I shall meet new people, and try, if I can, to banish the wretched regret that overwhelms me when I think of you. I don't say the sin was all yours. I am willing to take my share of the blame. But I was foolishly ignorant, Dick, and you—you knew.

Good-bye. Gwen.

Santa Barbara, July 10th.

Dear Dick,

You really should try to get away from business long enough to come down here. We are having such a charming time. Mother is quite delighted with the climate, the people and everything. Gordon came with us, and I never knew our big brother could thaw so. He's doing society in quite a dashing way, and all the girls are in love with him. But he has developed a pronounced crush in one direction, and so is impervious to the most fascinating smiles of the others. She is not a beauty, either, but I like her the best of anybody we've met here. We met her in an unconventional manner, too. She is staying at the hotel, and is quite alone. She is reserved in manner, and never spoke to anybody until we almost forced ourselves upon her notice. Sister Jen's little girl was playing with a knife—naughty child!—one day and it slipped and cut an awful gash in her hand. There was no one about at the time, except Miss Durham—that's her name, you know, Gwendolyn Durham—and she tied up the wound and soothed poor Tootsy's cries. Of course, Jen was very grateful. We all were, for fancy what might have happened—lockjaw and all sorts of horrid things. We insisted on having Gwendolyn come and join us at lunch, and though she did not seem to like having her armor of reserve broken into, we are used to having our way, and we got it as usual. I am simply insane over Gwen—she's the sweetest thing. She is clever, too, but not obtrusively so. Mother has taken an enormous fancy to her, and Gordon—well, you know what a man of thirty-five is when he gets interested in a woman for the first time. Do come down, Dick, if you can.

Your affectionate sister, Mayme.

Santa Barbara, July fifteenth.

Deer unkle Dick,

We miss you verry much and hope you will come down soon. I dig in the sand. I cut my hand and a lovely lady tied it up for me. Her name is Miss Gwen. She loves little girls. I love her.

Your neece, Tootsy.

Santa Barbara, July twentieth.

Dear Dick,

Do you believe in fate? I did not choose this part of the world for any particular reason. Fate must have willed it so. I suppose I should go away at once. But they are so dear to me—your mother and sisters. Your brother, too, treats me as women should be treated. Why weren't you like that, Dick? Because I was not a society girl, of your world, why did you have less consideration for me? You did not think me worthy to stand beside your sisters, but I think their regard for me is real. Would they care less, would they despise me, if they knew? Why is there one rule for you, and another for me? If you tell me so, Dick, I will go. I will leave this place, which is so pleasant to

Rich Gold Discovery in Calaveras County

Bed of Calaveritas Creek at Calaveritas Heavy With the Precious Metals

Gravel Carrying Sand Running $6000 to the Ton Located

There is perhaps no more famous mining district in the world than Calaveras county, Cal. In the early fifties Calaveritas was a thriving mining camp with a population of upward of 2,000 people, money flowed like water in the creek by the same name that ran through the town. In those days men got rich separating the gold from the gravel of the surrounding country with the crude rockers then in use, and millions of dollars have been carried from this section on pack mules to the then distant town of Sacramento and thence to the seaboard at San Francisco.

Now, at this point there are but a few deserted cabins, an occasional ranch and the bed of the old stream, dry in summer but a tumbling torrent in the winter, while for forty-five years not a pick or shovel has entered this ground.

Calaveritas is situated on the mother lode about midway between San Andreas and Angel's Camp, and it was here that W. G. Rifenburg, E. M., a miner and prospector of years of experience, uncovered a deposit of gold a few months ago that proved so rich as to dazzle the imagination of even the most experienced and accustomed assayers. At a depth of twenty feet in the bed of this creek he found a black sand, the assayer's recovery from which was $6,000 per ton in pure virgin gold, while the free gold was $40 per ton. Mr. Rifenburg states that this is the richest sand in the world yet discovered.

Mr. Rifenburg hastened to San Francisco, and after co-operating with a few gentlemen formed a company, to be known as the Calaveras Dredging and Mining Company, to whom he had the property deeded and made the following report:

To the Calaveras Dredging and Mining Company, San Francisco—Gentlemen: I have finished the examination of your property, situated at Calaveritas. I find that by careful free tests that the gravel will pay 50 cents per cubic yard in free gold. This is principally surface work; that it contains seven pounds of black sand; that a portion of it is the richest I have ever worked. The lowest recovery was forty-one ($41.00) dollars per ton; the highest was six thousand ($6,000.00) dollars in gold, the richest sand known to me on the globe. It is a great mystery to me that this has not been worked before. However, I obtained the values and am prepared to do so again.

The richest sand I ever tested before was from the Porcupine district, in Alaska, it running two thousand three hundred ($2,300.00) dollars per ton. I frequently find values as high as two hundred and fifty ($250.00) dollars to three hundred ($300.00) dollars per ton. I believe your recoveries will not be less than three million ($3,000,000.00) dollars from this deposit.

I consider your selection good and must recommend you to invest and push this to a finish. Take in the situation and natural advantages, a better property will be hard to find.

There is no method that will surpass the modern dredger for working gravel and recovering gold. There are hundreds of them now working. The modern dredger is with us and has come to stay.

Respectfully yours,
(Signed.) W. G. Rifenburg, E. M..

Mr. Rifenburg announces that the only way to work this property is by a modern dredger.

The company owns two and a half miles of this creek. The ground is free from logs or large bowlders, and can be successfully worked by a dredger of modern type. Such a dredger will be incorporated and will handle 2,000 cubic yards of gravel per day of twenty-four hours, with modern concentrators for working the black sand. These dredgers are no experiment, as they are today working successfully in nearly every gravel mining camp on this continent, as well as in South Africa. The profits from such a dredger at Calaveritas would be over $1,000 a day net. Samples of the free gold and black sand heretofore mentioned can be seen at the office of the company in San Francisco.

The incorporators of the company have subscribed a number of thousand dollars for the preliminary work of getting together the necessary material for working this proposition, and now they have concluded to place a limited amount of the treasury stock within the reach of small investors on monthly payments, if desired, on the following terms, the par value of the shares being $100, and the company being incorporated for 10,000 shares. This small amount of stock will be sold at $25.00 per share, $5.00 per share being cash and the balance at the rate of $5.00 per month. The day the dredger is installed the company will have an income of $1,000.00 a day, and, as the company does not owe a dollar, no more stock will be sold, and the dividends will begin immediately. Not only will dividends be paid, but the stock will advance to par at once.

This stock is absolutely non-assessable and non-forfeitable. If any subscriber is unable to meet deferred payments, it is arranged so that the stock for every dollar he has paid will be issued him.

If there are any readers of this paper who desire to stand in in a small way on this wonderfully rich proposition they are advised to put in their application at once, as the opportunity will not last but a very short time, for more than one-half the money required is now in the treasury.

Maps, pictures, affidavits and information regarding the property and work now being done will be furnished free upon application to A. P. Fuller, secretary, or W. G. Rifenburg, E. M., at the office of the company, suit 402, Callaghan building, 1312 Market street, San Francisco, who will personally be glad to assist any interested person to a clear understanding of this opportunity, and any persons who are desirous of seeing this property the company would be pleased to show them the ground and pay all expenses if a sufficient amount of stock would be purchased, provided the proposition proved as represented.

me. I will never see them again—your mother, darling Tootsy, dear Jennie and Mayme, who calls me her dearest friend, and Gordon. Must I, Dick?

Gwen.

San Francisco, August seventh.

My dear Dick,

Can't you come to town for a day? I should like to talk with you. I am in love, Dick, in love for the first time in my life. She's not a society woman, but she's a gentlewoman. She is not a beauty, but she is more than that. She does not love me—but I would rather marry her and have only her friendship, than the love of any other woman. When one loves at my age it is the real thing. You, my dear younger brother, with your success with the sex and your consequent indifference to any especial one of them, cannot enter into my feelings. But I want to talk to you. I want to tell you all about her, and treat you to the rhapsodies of a lover. It will bore you, but I can't keep it bottled up forever. I must tell somebody. Mother and the girls love her. Jen's little girl adores her. She's the most adorable woman in the world—but she says she cannot marry me. You must tell me how, Dick, you who know women so well, how to shake her resolution. I am foolish, I am a boy again, when I think of her.

Yours, Gordon.

Los Angeles, September first.

Dear Dick,

The hardest question of my life I bring to you to answer. Shall I? Can I? I don't know what to do. I do not love your brother, but I feel that I could learn to love him. Not with that wild, reckless love you won—and cast aside—but the calm love that is based on mutual respect and friendship. You asked me, Dick, to be—well, I refused. Your brother has asked me to be his wife. Must I refuse? Gwendolyn.

Murillo's Magdalen

Framed was I for Love's offices; Thy hand
Shaped me for Love's embraces, Thou dread Lord.
The scheme that was by Thee, my Maker, planned,
Hath reaped its harvest,—paid the reckonings scored!
I came not to this stress of my accord:
Thyself didst face me down the fatal road
That leads to Hell! Wherefor, dear God, afford
Ease to Thy creature in her last abode.

Ah, how I loved! O God, dost understand
How I Thy Son did love—I, The Abhorred?
His feet my tears have washed and freed from sand;
This golden hair has dried them. My reward:
Thy everlasting Hell, Thy ceaseless sword,
Tortures unending, fires and thirst that goad,
—Predestined all! Give, Saviour, Thou Adored,
Ease to Thy creature in her last abode.

Take back my beauty! Let Thy dread command
Efface it—with its guilt! My breast is gored
—My guilty breast!—with levin for thy brand.
Yet was I but Thy sport! Shall I, ignored,
Abandon hope of Paradise star-floored?
Wander the steppes of Hell by Thy stern code?
O God, have mercy! How I have implored
Ease to Thy creature in her last abode!

L'ENVOY.

O Prince of Peace, upon whose feet I poured
My spikenard and my burning tears, my load
Of sin predestined loose. Give peace restored,—
Ease to Thy creature in her last abode.

WILLIAM E. LUTZ

Republican Nominee

William E. Lutz, the Republican Nominee for the office of Public Administrator, is essentially a self-made man.

At the age of sixteen, he enlisted in the Army, and served through the entire war, and received an honorable discharge. He is now a member of the George H. Thomas Post of this city, and was Secretary of the Executive Committee that had charge of the National Encampment of the Grand Army, which was held in this city in August last.

Shortly after the termination of the war, he removed to San Francisco, where he has since resided. After his arrival in this city, he worked for several years at his trade as a butcher in the California Market, and is well and favorably known to all who are engaged in that business in this city.

During the years that he was working at his trade, he devoted his spare time to study and self-improvement, and has advanced himself to such an extent that he has for many years past occupied positions requiring a man of strict integrity and ability. He is at present engaged in the insurance business at No. 205 Sansome street, and is also Secretary of many business associations.

He has for more than twenty years devoted himself to charitable work in fraternal organizations to which he belongs, has served for many years as a member of various relief committees, and for several years was one of the directors of the German Benevolent Society, and also Vice-President thereof.

The Public Administrator is intrusted with estates where it is incumbent upon him to protect the interests of widows and orphans, and he should therefore be a man of unquestionable integrity and ability, and a man of mature years and judgment.

As Mr. Lutz possesses all these qualifications, we think he is entitled to the suffrages of the voters of San Francisco.

The Campaign Lie

Mr. Franklin K. Lane has the reputation of being a very adroit campaigner. His friends say that he is a good "vote-getter;" that he knows how to "jolly" an audience. He has what the Irishman calls "the gift of gab," and with it he combines the tricks of the mummer to impart plausibility to his utterances. Mr. Lane's first occupation on leaving college was that of a stump-speaker. He hired out as a boy-orator on the pay-roll of that old charlatan, "Vinegar Bitters" McDonald, and became a propagandist in the temperance cause. Later on he was employed as a stump-speaker for various politicians, and finally he started out to campaign for himself, and he has been a job-chaser ever since. He is not a polished orator, but he is a good rough-and-ready talker of the camp-meeting exhorter style, and he becomes truly eloquent when expatiating on his own virtues and superior claims to public confidence. But studies of one's own exalted personality have a tendency to contract the views and deaden the sensibility of those who follow them with assiduity. It is by repeatedly perusing and intently contemplating a few great models that the mind is best disciplined. Demosthenes is said to have transcribed six times the history of Thucydides. Mr. Lane is content to contemplate himself, and draw inspiration from the subject for panegyrics on the Democratic candidate for Mayor. In consequence of the narrowness of his view-point he has, like other men of circumscribed intellect who have posed as orators, indulged in lively sophistry and exaggeration which deceive the auditors for the moment. He does not stop to consider that his remarks are taken down by stenographers and published by the daily papers. Those speeches are not read with the temper of those to whom they were addressed. We all know that the object of oratory alone is not truth but persuasion, but the wise candidate for office addresses himself less to the audience than to the reporters. He thinks less of the few hearers than of the innumerable readers. No doubt Mr. Lane impresses his hearers with his bald assertions and his passionate entreaties, but his fallacies do not escape detection when read at leisure. His speeches proclaim the mountebank. When as a hired spieler he was shouting the virtues of vinegar bitters he was not more reckless than he has been since the opening of this campaign. A man with so little regard for the truth as he appears to have would be a very dangerous individual to clothe with the authority which is vested in the Mayor of this city. One of the yarns which he has been spinning with great gusto is about a combination between Ruef and the Republican manager. He has repeatedly asserted that Schmitz was the choice of the Republican managers, and that Crocker was nominated to draw votes from the Democracy. The absurdity of this fiction is so patent that it is not worth discussing, but it is an index to the character of its author. Mr. Lane knows that Schmitz and Ruef have been repudiated by the Republican leaders, and yet he boldly and unblushingly takes his stand on a public platform, and with the effrontery of a patent-medicine spieler lauding his worthless wares, gravely asserts that a combination has been made by the leading Republicans of this city which has for its object the betrayal of their own party. Mr. Lane is popularly believed to be a plausible and tactful faker and an accomplished dissembler, but he isn't. He lacks the discretion employed by the successful gold-brick artist. He is not an artful liar. He appraises his own keenness too highly and underestimates that of others. Moreover he lacks the repose of the successful campaigner. He should be content to let his newspaper organs slander his opponents, and at the same time affect disapproval of the employment of hoodlum tactics. Even a candidate for Mayor of San Francisco may conduct himself as a gentleman without jeopardizing his own interests. The spectacle of Mr. Lane taking himself seriously on the stump, and apotheosizing himself in rounded periods, is diverting, but when he dons the garments of the fish-woman he superinduces nausea.

The Shifting of Innes

The Rev. Stephen Bonaparte Innes, an Episcopal clergyman of this city, has announced his conversion to Catholicism. There is nothing remarkable about his defection. The Catholic church is full of ex-Episcopal ministers, many of whom have become priests of the Church of Rome, but there is no likelihood of the Rev. Innes entering the priesthood. He is married and devoted to his wife, and therefore he would be extremely reluctant to take the vow of celibacy, but even though he were a bachelor he would find it difficult to break into the Catholic priesthood. If he attempted to do so the objection would be urged against him that—to borrow from the argot of the politician—it was hard for him to "stay put." Stephen Bonaparte Innes was formerly a Catholic. Certain circumstances which he does not care to mention rendered it impossible for him to become a priest, and as he felt that he was unfit for other vocations he became an Episcopalian minister. Rather a strange reason for an honest man to change his religion. A man who feels that the ministry is his vocation, and who, because he cannot enter it in one sect, joins another, has no very positive convictions. There have been many Catholics who felt that they would like to join the priesthood but who were deterred from entering because of the vow of celibacy. Though the ministry was the profession of their choice, their conscience as well as their temperament restrained them from entering it, and they took to some other occupation. But they remained loyal to the church whose doctrines they believed. Not so the Rev. Stephen Bonaparte Innes. He decided to sample Episcopalianism, the discipline of the church being less strict, and after seven years of it he has decided to wander back again. And now he says that, after mature deliberation, he reached the conclusion that as compared with the Catholic church the Episcopalian is merely the shell without the kernel. Perhaps after a little while he will conclude that as compared with the Episcopal church the Catholic is merely the kernel without the shell, and jump back again, or else become a Presbyterian in the hope of finding the kernel and shell intact. A great deal may depend on the success that attends his efforts, for evidently it is the matter of vocation that concerns Dr. Innes. Perhaps he feels that he is qualified to take the place of Henry Austin Adams, the Catholic convert from Episcopalianism who lectured to large profits under the auspices of Catholic societies, until he developed an illicit passion for a pretty girl, and then levanted to Australia. We shall deeply sympathize with Dr. Innes in whatever he undertakes, for when a man is in a state of uncertainty regarding the precise manner in which he should provide for the future of his soul, he requires a great deal of soothing encouragement.

Contagious Diseases

Rheumatism is the latest addition to the list of contagious diseases, and just as soon as the daily papers begin to reprint articles and paragraphs from the medical journals we may expect to see an agitation over the need of a quarantine law. Thus far the proofs adduced do not seem to prove anything, for they appear to be confined to the relation of instances in which more than one case of the disease has appeared in a single family, either simultaneously or successively. Apparently no attention has been given to the obvious fact that like causes will produce like effects, so that if a dwelling place is damp or draughty all the inmates are as likely as any one of them to suffer from the effects. If all are engaged in the same occupation under practically the same conditions, what will induce rheumatism in one case is more than likely to produce it in the others, so that the several examples of illness are quite as likely to have been contracted at first hand as "caught" from another member of the family. Another cause is also lost sight of—that of unconscious imitation. There are people so constituted that they invariably imagine they are afflicted with every disease they hear of, and if the symptoms and sufferings are described with sufficient minuteness of detail they do induce the disease through sympathy, though if they heard nothing on the subject they would worry along very well without it. The compounders of patent medicines show a profound knowledge of human nature when they publish pamphlets in which they set forth at length the grateful tributes of those who have been miraculously preserved by swallowing their concoctions. Nine people out of ten are like the immortal J. of "Three Men in a Boat," who, after poring over the Medical Encyclopedia, found himself afflicted with every disease set forth except "housemaid's knee," and he would not have let that miss him if he had known what it was. The less that is said about disease in general and the less theories and remedies are discussed in the public journals, the less likelihood there is for raising a community of invalids. Good health is just as contagious as disease if people would make it so.

The Belligerent Club Woman

The little ruction amongst the Daughters of the Confederacy is a very mild affair in comparison to what the gentle dames are doing elsewhere. The alacrity with which women's associations split themselves into factions, and declare war upon one another, makes the mere man pause in wonder as to what will be the aspect of the political field if they are granted the "right to suffer." This is not the first time that our local hen-clubs have pecked and cackled so lustily that the echoes have reached beyond the lodge rooms, but thus far they have not disrupted churches, broken up business relations by wholesale, or been summoned before police magistrates to answer charges of assault and battery and disturbance of the public peace. They had a sewing circle in an Illinois town a few years ago, and somebody commented on some one's cat-stitches, and the result was pandemonium. The ladies took sides, and their husbands, brothers, sweethearts and fathers were involved. One set wanted to give a social for the benefit of the church and the others won over the janitress, so that they obtained possession of the keys, and there was not even admittance, much less fire and lights, vouchsafed the enemy. Then representatives of the two factions met on the street and missiles heavier than words were exchanged, millinery was mauled from heads, and clothing torn, until the police took a hand and marched as many as could be captured off to the police station. Just now the little village of Stapleton, on Staten Island, is undergoing a similar experience. The Ladies' Missionary Society was holding a stormy meeting in the room adjoining a hall where the lecturer was addressing the Sunday-school. The ladies became so vociferous that a messenger was sent to caution them to lower their voices, and as might have been expected, they took umbrage at the insult and adjourned their meeting. The officers of the association and their immediate followers voted to withdraw from the church, while a goodly number of other members thought there was not cause sufficient for so radical a proceeding, so they, regarding themselves as the original body, proceeded to elect a new set of officers and to demand of the seceders the records and the contents of the treasury. Of course the demand was refused, and as in the Illinois case, the male contingent was called into action, with the result that the church is divided and business relations which have endured for years are at an end. The Woman's Auxiliary of the Spanish War Veterans showed themselves equally belligerent last month, when the annual business meeting was held in New Haven, Connecticut. The delegates of one chapter had not the last pass-word and were thrown out of the hall bodily. The officers of the chapter again demanded admission and on being refused, attempted to force an entrance. Some of the most muscular sisters amongst the insiders set their backs against the door, and for awhile it looked as though there would be active need for a carpenter, but force of numbers prevailed, the door suddenly slammed shut, and one of the insurgents had two fingers caught and badly crushed, while others were thrown down, trampled, scratched, bruised and generally done up, and the damage to best gowns and the latest millinery concoctions was enough to draw tears from the stony eyes of the Bartholdi Goddess of Liberty. Oh, there is no question but what the woman is arriving, and what these affairs will be, after another generation, when the dear creatures have had the experience and training derived from collegiate color rushes, no one dare contemplate. So let us be thankful that our daughters and dames, native and colonial, have thus far confined their warfare to mere words.

The Tuberculosis Problem

Medical opinion continues to change on the tuberculosis problem. It is probably the most important problem with which the scientific world has to deal, and there is no disease concerning which medical opinion has changed so often. The theory of hereditary transmission upon which all medical men agreed some years ago is now generally discredited; all the old familiar methods of treatment have been abandoned, and physicians are divided as to the climate which is most effective in staying the ravages of the disease. The identity of bovine and human tuberculosis has within the last five years been disputed by high authorities, and though it is beyond question communicable, there are many who refuse to accept the common theory of the contagiousness of the disease as generally understood. Probably the most eminent authority on the subject today is Professor von Behring, who says that rarely is tuberculosis acquired in adult life, though it may be stirred to activity after lying dormant, as it were, from infancy. The main source of infection, according to his opinion, is milk, whether it be the milk of the mother or cow's milk. Professor von Behring recently awakened the interest of the medical world by announcing that he was perfecting a prophylactic similar to Jenner's in small-pox. His method has as yet been employed only in animals, and he is not ready to put it to the test in human infants. He is confident that before long he will be able to announce the discovery of a vaccine against tuberculosis.

An Object Lesson for Journalism

What a fine object lesson Colonel Henry Watterson presents to the autocratic editors of the big metropolitan journals! Colonel Henry Watterson is the editor of a comparatively small daily newspaper in a comparatively obscure town in the old but comparatively unimportant State of Kentucky. Yet whenever the grand old Kentucky colonel opens his mouth on a public platform or dashes off an editorial on a national topic, all the other editors in the country sit up and take notice. There is not an editor in New York, Chicago, Philadelphia or any of the other large cities of the country whose utterances command the respectful consideration that is given to those of the Louisville journalist. Yet the Louisville Courier-Journal is not noted for its mammoth circulation, nor is Colonel Watterson distinguished as the brainiest of newspaper men or the most sagacious of statesmen. Why then should so much importance be attached to his statements? Simply because he is known to be an honest man and a conscientious editor who says what he thinks, and who does not seek to mould public opinion by misrepresentation and specious argument. It is the theory of the latter-day journalist that the editorial is a superfluous feature of a newspaper; that people no longer care for the opinion of the editor, and that the way to mould public opinion is to color the news. The theory of the latter-day journalist is in a measure correct, for his character is judged by that of his paper, which is usually very bad. As a consequence his preachments are unheeded. He can no more hope to influence his readers by direct appeal than could a minister who bore a reputation for immorality hope to impress his congregation with his views. That the editorials of the new school of journalism are of no importance is evident from the absolute futility of newspaper support of any man or measure in this city. Whatever influence the local dailies exercise emanates from their news columns, and that is not great because their most intelligent subscribers are incredulous. Nobody ever quotes their editorial opinions seriously. Their editorials are merely explanatory of the position they have assumed, and serve to prepare people for the tone of their local columns. What a splendid contrast the Louisville Courier-Journal affords! A short time ago Colonel Watterson issued a jeremiad against the fashionables of Newport, and he was quoted in nearly every daily in the country. His opinions on national politics never fail to provoke discussion. Recently he turned his guns on the French Panama canal company, and he startled not only the Eastern press but the statesmen of Europe. He alleged that the French company offered at private sale all its rights, privileges and property in the isthmus for six millions, or thirty-four millions less than the United States bound itself by treaty to pay. Later on the company agreed to take twenty millions for its share, and that twenty millions more should be divided among members of the United States Senate who should succeed in passing a bill for the selection of the Panama route. He also charged that members of the United States canal commission received their share of this corruption fund, and that the Washington correspondents of several American newspapers pocketed all of it that they could lay their hands on. Now Colonel Watterson's statements are being challenged on all sides, but the Colonel is sticking to his guns. Nobody doubts but that he wrote what he believed was true and upon evidence sufficient to influence the judgment of a sane man. Some day a man of the Watterson type may start a daily newspaper in San Francisco, and then we shall see how long the personal organs of our rich politicians will be able to hold their subscribers.

Faces that Mean Something

BY HARRY COWELL

Some one—George Eliot, if I mistake not—speaks touchingly of faces that mean something. The exact phrase I cannot at this moment call to mind. That is not a matter of any importance. My concern here is with the idea rather than with the words. Her own is a face that means much, having its full share of infinity, its fact behind the fact. It is not handsome, but its high homeliness is significant, suggestive, and has eternal charm. It is not a poem; it has, however, that "other beauty" of prose. If it does not delight the eye, it moves the imagination. It provokes the long, long thought of the adult that dreams. Recreated by the fancy of the beholder, it at length becomes almost beautiful. And if George Henry Lewes had come to consider it more lovely than that of the divinest of Raphael's Madonnas, his taste, to my way of thinking, would not have been so ridiculously at fault as it would have appeared to those to whom a fact is a fact and a face such and such features. Nor would his preference have been merely the result of one of those everyday miracles wrought by the lover's eye. Really beautiful to me has at times been the "horse face" of the author of "Daniel Deronda," transfigured, as it was, by fancy, seen through a veil of romance.

More and more I find myself interested in the strange beauty—beauty of beauty or beauty of ugliness—of the faces of those who have lived;—tell-tale faces, written all over by the hand of the master-realist, Experience; faces that are often palimpsests and always symbols. See, here is the wondrous handiwork of Love, there the touch of Tragedy, and this is no other than the faultless finish of Sorrow, "the work of the file."

In the face of a woman which I once saw at a concert was visible, written in letters of fire, the whole history of the Jewish race. A fateful face it was, very reserved, yet all the more eloquent because fools and wayfaring men would have called it inexpressive. The irreparable wrong done to the Semite was there; the pride of a people chosen of God was there; there also scorn for the heartless Aryan, forever incapable of understanding the red-ripe Semitic heart. Physical and spiritual persistence were there, and the over-soul of those who still walk under the protecting shadow of Jehovah's wings. "I am fit," it seemed to say. "I am fittest. The world against me, I have survived." In the droop of the eyelid was the story of Leah, the forsaken, of Rachael who wept for her children that were not, and would not be comforted; in the nostrils that opened to breathe in life itself, and emitted as it were a fine flame, and in lips the color of passion, and in cheeks to match, and in the burnished amorous hair, and in the limpid eyes, was the song of songs, the song of Solomon, the greatest love poem in any language.

As I watched her, I wept for sorrows which neither she nor I had suffered, and blushed for infamous deeds which I had never done nor ever dreamed of doing—sorrows suffered by the hearts of her forbears because of infamies inflicted by the hands of mine. As I watched her I read, now the large history of the human heart, again the lesser history of a great and strange and fascinating race, and yet again, the still lesser history of an unknown woman of thirty, type of "the woman of thirty" whom men adore. What a task—how sad, how delightful—the attempt to disentangle the individual sorrow from the racial, the racial from the universal—the omnipresent sorrow, widespread as man!

Here is but a hint of what a face—not that of a friend—meant to me one evening. I watched it more than I listened to the music. The music that evening was, alas, meaningless. Had it, however, been full of meaning, I should have heard it all the better because of that face.

No bud-faced girl, with her pleasant perfume of young womanhood, all surface, obvious throughout, could possibly affect me as did that full-blown rose of Sharon, that deep, sad-faced daughter of Israel, so far wandered from the well loved, sun-kissed East, with mystery and infinity writ large and lovely upon pale brow and drooping lid.

This reading of faces is no facile physiognomy; it is a distinct art, intimate, pleasant to practice, but difficult to perfect.

There are dog-fanciers, pigeon-fanciers, flower-fanciers and others, and each class is able to distinguish and delight in certain minute excellences in the respective objects of their interest, which the uninitiated do not see unaided, and seeing do not appreciate. As for me, I belong to the man-fanciers, the lantern of my eyes ever alight, looking for a fine specimen. What would I not give to find a male face fit mate for Mona Lisa! Never shall I get over my disgust at a certain literary man who declared unblushingly that he preferred the shallow beauty of a certain modern maiden, who had lived her little twenty summers on the surface of things, to hers who had been "a diver into deep seas," who had been "dead many times and learned the secrets of the grave."

Mere faultlessness of feature pleases me as a flower might please, but the genuine interest and pleasure of the man-fancier lie in disengaging whatever modifications the particular life of each man has made upon his original face, the gift of parents and other ancestors. For each of us who lives intensely fashions a face for himself. To the connoisseur the meaning of faces is clear. To him meaningless beauty in man or woman is a non-human thing, uninteresting, almost repellant.

The Disappointed Job-Chaser

Once upon a time there lived a Politician who nursed a Great Ambition. He was of the Legal Profession, but he lacked Capacity except for one thing, and that was to appreciate his own Inability to achieve success at the Bar. So he decided to become a Statesman, for he had certain qualities of Mind which fitted him for the Trade. Chief among them was a faculty for adjusting himself to both sides of the Same Question. He was also a Master of Equivocation, and an accomplished Dissembler. To achieve his Ambition he began, at an early Age, to cultivate a Glad Hand and a Winning Smile. He utilized both to such advantage that he was soon elected to Office. Then he proceeded to give Rein to his Great Ambition. He plied his Glad Hand and lavished his Winning Smile on all sides and in the course of a comparatively short time was Nominated for Governor of a Great Commonwealth. The attainment of this Job was his Great Ambition and it looked Easy. His Opponent was a Cow County Job Chaser, who didn't stand well in the large centres of Population, but he was not such an easy mark as the Politician with the Great Ambition imagined. The latter was so flattered at finding Himself the Standard Bearer of a Big Party that he spent most of his time Pointing to Himself with Pride. He developed a well-defined case of Megalomania. He called all the People to Witness that he was It; that he was doing them a Favor in Condescending to become their Ruler; that they Needed him in their Business, and that he was the Choice of the Divinity. When the votes were counted it was discovered that he had Almost won. He was beaten by None save the Only man that ran against Him. His Great Ambition had receded somewhat, but he did not lose Courage. He said to Himself that Faint Heart ne'er caught the Early Worm and as he had taken the Precaution to Hold on to the Job to which he had been previously elected he was not exactly on the Bum. He resolved to Bide his Opportunity, perfect the Motor of his political Air Ship, and wait for propitious Zephyrs to soar again. His Glad Hand was still busy, and within one year he was regarded as the Logical Candidate for Mayor of the only town wherein he reduced the majority of the Cow County Job Chaser. It occurred to him that, after having tried for the Governorship, it might be Infra Dig to run for Mayor, but the Job Chasing Habit had a firm hold on him. It also occurred to him that he was going Backward, but he persuaded himself that the Mayoralty was a Steppingstone to his Great Ambition. Besides he couldn't lose. So he was soon again spurring his Jaded Steed in hot pursuit of the enticing job. And once more he posed as the Claimant by Divine Right, the only blown in the Bottle, and incidentally the solitary Simon Pure, predestined Savior of the People's Rights. He proclaimed Himself The Man of the Hour. He composed lyrics in laudation of Himself. He rhapsodized over his own Peculiar fitness, and he abused his adversaries. There were three of them this time, and more's the pity, for when it was all over, it was found that having stopped in the stretch to contemplate himself rapturously in his Pocket Mirror, he had failed to come inside the money. The blow sickened him, but thereafter he undertook to make an Honest living. The change was so Violent that he was a Failure at it.

The moral of this historic tale is that it is hazardous to take oneself seriously in politics. —The Fabler.

Clancy on the "Situashin"

"Now Clancy, I'm no mind reader, but I know jist phwat you want me to tell you. Now don't ashke me or there'll be throuble. There hasn't been a man in here today who hasn't put th' queshtin' to me an' I'm sick an' tired iv tellin' them. Phwat you want to know is the ixact situashin an' I'm not goin' to tell you. I don't like to desave a frind. Iv coorse I could do like some people I know, who'll tell you phwat'd happin if th' illecshin took place today, but I hate equivicashin. Have you met him, Clancy?"

"To whom have you rif'rinse?" asked Clancy.

"To th' cawshis man who has both hands on th' public pulse an' who knows jist phwat th' ixact situashin is today, but whose modesty forbids him fr'm tellin' you phwat changes might possibly take place bechune now an' Novimber. Iv coorse I know ye've met him. He waylays you on ivry cor-rner. 'It's jist like this,' he sez, 'Ugeen had a head shtart,' he sez, 'on all iv them,' he sez. 'He beat th' barrier,' he sez, 'an there was no recall flag,' he sez. 'He's close to th' rail,' he sez, 'an' goin' fasht to th' quarter,' he sez. 'If it was ownly a half mile,' he sez, 'it'd be all off but th' shoutin',' he sez. 'I know,' he sez, 'that if th' illecshin took place today,' he sez, 'Ugeen would walk in, but—,' he sez, an' then he pawzis an' looks at you knowingly. If you appear to take him seryusly he'll go on. 'But iv coorse,' he sez, 'it's a long way off till illecshin day,' he sez. 'Lane is a great campaigner,' he sez, 'an' Crocker,' he sez, 'is a great mixer an' makes many frinds,' he sez. 'Howiver,' he sez, 'Lane'll be third in th' race unless—' an' then he pawzis again. By the time he gets through with you, he has had all three iv them third in th' race undher certain circumshtancis. Lasht year he was around askin' people if they'd heard about th' poll that was takin' iv th' clerks in Roseinthawl's shoe shtore. I believe it was two f'r Schmitz, three f'r Wells an' fifteen f'r Tobin. This year he will tell you how th' men iv th' Union Iron Wurrks are goin' to vote. It's evident to me, Clancy, that th' humerists are goin' into pollaticks an' that th' pollatishins are becomin' unconshis humerists. There's Lane f'r inshtinse, who sez himself that he's th' man an' plashters th' fensis with th' announcement. Would he do it if he wasn't fond iv a joke? It's his unconshis humer. Iv course I know that th' habit iv self-contemplashin is so shtrong in him that it's har-rd f'r him to see anybody in th' campaign but himself. Howiver, occashinly he makes a conceshin to other greatness than his own, as he did th' other day when he said some nice things about Abe Lincoln jist to show that he wasn't wrapped up in himself entirely. I shpose that as long as Abe is dead and in no way likely to dishpute th' limelight, Frankling Kay felt that he could afford to be magnanimous."

"I shpose," said Clancy, 'that th' only way to find th' throo shtate iv affairs about th' illecshin is to watch th' newspapers."

"Well, I dinnaw," said Casey. "Far be it fr'm me to disparidge th' pallajims iv our liberty, but I don't think they're throwin' much light on th' situashin. They remind me iv Riley th' night he was caught comin' out iv me shtore with two bottles iv whishky under his coat. The poeleece wanted to know about th' whishky but Riley wanted to talk about th' weather. You see, Clancy, one pa-aper is boomin' Lane as th' only honest man in th' city, an' th' other pa-apers are quotin' fr'm th' columns iv their hated contimprary to show that it didn't think so a year ago. It's been caught with th' goods on but it doesn't care to dishcuss the matter. It prayfurs to quote fr'm th' columns iv its contimpraries to show that they 'are boomin' men f'r office whom they had preveyusly denounced as thaves and rascals. As Father Nunan wanst said, 'Ye can't have much confidense in them that has no confidense in themselves. Afther shtudeen th' pa-apers closely I've come to th' conclushin that they don't believe phwat they say themselves. They're especially oblivyus to th' truth in campaign times, because th' truth is gin'rally disasthrus to any man runnin' f'r offiis. You must lie about your own candidate because it wouldn't do to confess th' truth about him, an' you must lie about th' other fella to make him out worse than he is. That's phwat th' pa-apers are doin', an' incident'ly they're lyin about one another an' about themselves. Lane's evenin' or-rgan shtated th' other day that it hadn't been able to support a Raypublican candidate for Mayor f'r several years because th' Raypublican leaders wouldn't nominate good men. Yet two years ago that same pa-aper was supportin' Asa R. Wells, th' Raypublican candidate against Joe Tobin, as clean an' good a man as iver lived. An' by th' way, Clancy, that reminds me that James Dewval Phelan is out iv town. There's a shrewd man, Clancy, f'r he has th' shrewdness to deceive himself. He thinks that by goin' away people won't know that he's interested in th' illecshin. It's Phelan's money that's payin' Lane's expinsis. It's Phelan that secured f'r Lane th' support iv th' evening pa-aper that wouldn't support Joe Tobin lasht year. Do you know why he didn't get th' support iv th' pa-aper f'r Tobin?"

"No," said Clancy, "why didn't he?"

"Do you know that he promised it to Tobin?"

"No, I don't."

"Well, he did, but I won't tell you why he didn't keep his promise. It's enough f'r ye to know that Michael Feeneys are bor-rn here as well as in th' ole country. An' it's also enough f'r ye to know that many a frind iv Joe Tobin will vote agin Jim Phelan's man Lane next Novimber."

The Saunterer

A Test of Sentiment

According to the Examiner "all the elements of society which are against good government and public order are against Mr. Lane and the Democratic ticket." The day after which that statement appeared in the Monarch a poll was taken of the men on Mr. Hearst's pay-roll, and the result was a surprise. Notwithstanding the Examiner's dissemination of vigorous rhetoric designed to go straight to the gizzard without regard for syntax, it appears that the influence of the great daily is scarcely felt even among the bright young journalists and skilled mechanics employed in the several departments of the paper. It is evident that the Examiner's employes have not that acute sense of the municipal peril which is responsible for those horrendous yawps across the back page of that highly entertaining daily. It seems that the working journalist has a higher regard than his employer for consistency. A year ago the Examiner staff was against Lane to a man, and the paper has been unable to switch its men in such a short space of time. But let the poll speak for itself. There were one hundred and fifty-seven men interviewed. Of that number twenty-two were for Lane, forty-four were for Schmitz and ninety-two were for Crocker. From these figures it appears that some crooked work was done, and I believe the guilty party was a well known political writer who voted twice for Crocker.

Ruef's Star Play

There are more ways of making a political campaign than are to be found in the philosophy of the average jobchaser. That artful dodger, Abe Ruef, has introduced a few new wrinkles. He is not content to flaunt the banners and the warm and engaging personality of his bewhiskered automaton. He believes in the potency of spectacularity of another sort. Hence the springing of the Police Department sensation which brought to light the grafting propensities of an enterprising young sergeant. Abe Ruef's Police Commissioner, Drinkhouse, was hot on the trail of the grafter, and Abe's Mayor was worked up to a high pitch of indignation over the revelations of blackmail. All of which had a tendency to convince the unsophisticated that the men who are spending a fortune in trying to reelect that paragon of virtue, Eugene Schmitz, are intent upon purifying the Police Department. The clever ruse contributed to the gaiety of the tenderloin, and even a few careless police officers wore a broad grin when they read about it.

Perkins for Secretary

With characteristic diplomacy Senator Perkins informed a reporter the other day, while discussing the story of the resignation of Postmaster Montague, that when it came to recommending a successor to that unfortunate and highly incompetent old gentleman, he would confer as usual with his colleague, Senator Bard. I have no doubt that he will extend that courtesy, for Senator Perkins is one of the most courteous of diplomats, but it will be the Perkins recommendation, however, that will go through. Senator Perkins, by the way, is today one of the most influential men in Washington. Few people in this State are aware of the esteem in which he is held by his confreres of the Upper House, or of his tremendous pull at the White House. I was recently told by a prominent naval official that in the East it was pretty generally believed that Perkins is the coming Secretary of the Navy.

Fisk His Choice

That Postmaster Montague is destined to retire to the obscurity of his stove-shop in the near future there is not the slightest doubt. Aside from the scandals that have sprung up under his nose he has given us a wretched administration, and the department is in need of just such a young man as Arthur Fisk to revolutionize affairs in the local office and vitalize the moribund staff of subordinates. Fisk is in all probability the choice of Perkins. It will be remembered that when the rival Senatorial forces were preparing for the fray in the last Legislature, the preliminary skirmish involved the Speakership, and that Fisk was the choice of the Perkins leaders for that strategic office. As Senator Perkins is distinguished for loyalty to his friends Fisk will no doubt get the job if he wants it.

Unsentimental Mackay

Now that the Mackay property at the corner of Fourth and Market streets has been sold, people are wondering why the Bonanza King never erected a monument to himself in this city. He built two fine structures in New York, but he never seemed to have sufficient confidence in the future of this city to invest his money in an imposing Market street building, and sentiment never influenced him in commercial affairs. His revenue from the ugly rookeries was larger than any that he could derive, according to his way of figuring, from a big building which would involve a heavy investment. But years ago, whenever the Supervisors threatened to force him to tear up the dilapidated wooden sidewalks along the Market street frontage and to substitue the regulation concrete, he always persuaded them to postpone action by saying that he was having plans drawn for a new building. For years he maintained those wooden sidewalks by false representations. In reporting the purchase of the property, the dailies stated that the local syndicate had borrowed six hundred thousand dollars. The total amount of the loan was in the neighborhood of one million dollars.

The Strange Case of Rev. Innes

The Reverend Innes has renounced the Episcopal Church and all its works to return to the jurisdiction of St. Peter's successor of the Vatican, but his salary will run on until January because his resignation from the church of which he is still rector will not take effect until the end of the year. I have heard no comment on the complaisance of the good people of the church of St. Mary the Virgin, but it strikes me as remarkably significant. Here is a minister who has made public announcement of the fact that he is no longer a communicant of the Episcopal Church; that he has found after careful investigation that Episcopalianism is all wrong; that it is not the true faith, and that he will have no more of it, but yet he is to continue to serve as rector of an Episcopal church. So says one of the daily papers, and I haven't heard the statement denied. Perhaps the gentleman with the elastic conscience has designs on the whole congregation and contemplates having them baptized in the Catholic faith. If such be his fond desire perhaps we shall hear somebody intimate that he has been acting as the emissary of Rome ever since he quit a Catholic seminary to become an Episcopal minister. However, in this age of religious unrest and fierce intolerance, the spectacle of a Roman Catholic serving as rector of an Episcopal Church is positively refreshing. But I fear that if the Rev. Innes continues to pose as a reverend he will find that he cannot at the same time be a communicant of the Catholic Church, even in the humble capacity of a layman. The Catholic Church discourages all forms of mockery.

Thought They'd Lose Their Rector

There was consternation in the vestry of St. Luke's a few weeks ago when it was learned that there was a prospect of losing the popular young rector, Rev. Burr Weedon. While he was on his vacation he received a call from a fashionable New York parish at a salary just twice as large as that he is now receiving. He would have accepted it were it not for the fact that Mrs. Weedon's fragile physique could not stand the rigors of the New York winter; so St. Luke's goes on its way rejoicing. There is a scarcity of pulpit orators in San Francisco these days, and the Rev. Burr Weedon is recognized as one of the most eloquent men in the city. He is an attractive personality, and to the fire of youth he adds the fire of enthusiastic devotion to a Cause spelled with a large "C."

The Power of Eloquence

The new church was built because Mr. Weedon's audiences filled the old church to overflowing and before the new auditorium is paid for, lo, it is already too small for those who come to hear. So it pays to have a man who can talk well. Many people think that the best preacher in the entire bay region is the Rev. Charles R. Brown of Oakland, and many people cross the bay to hear this eloquent young Southerner preach the faith of the Puritans. Mr. Brown is also a good politician and business man. The new rector of Grace church, Rev. Robert E. Lee Craig, is, of course, a Southerner by birth and traditions, but he comes here from an Omaha parish. Grace church has such a peculiar congregation that no one but a Southerner will do. The parish used to consist, it was said, only of old maids and bachelors. There are a few married people in it now, but there are not half a dozen children of parishioners in the Sunday-school. Nearly every one belongs to the aristocratic old Southern set in San Francisco, the set which includes the Colemans, the Gwins, the Ashes and all the rest of the Southern families. Dr. Foute was a Southerner and a Confederate officer, and none but Southrons need apply.

Anticipating a Will Contest

Claus Spreckels, I hear, has executed deeds conveying all his property to his wife and favorite children, his purpose being to preclude a will contest. Deeds may be the subject of contest, however, as well as a will, and disinherited children are not likely to forego the pleasure of prosecuting litigation over a big estate.

The Motor Races

Automobile enthusiasts are taking a great interest in the preparations for the motor and cycle races which are to take place on November sixth and seventh under the auspices of the Automobile Club of California. There are to be many sensational Eastern attractions, and some very daring chauffeurs will make their first appearance on this coast. Society will be well represented at the races.

The Economical Plan Abandoned

The politicians of San Jose are amused over the latest turn of affairs in the Board of Trustees of the Normal School. Dr. Dow and Frank Babb, the appointees of Governor Pardee, have been preaching economy ever since they took office, and last July they reduced the salaries of Miss Riebsen and Miss Isabelle McKenzie, a sister of Harbor Commissioner McKenzie. Last week their salaries were raised to the old figure, and incidentally the trustees created a job for Professor Volney Rattan, appointing him curator of the museum at a snug salary. Professor Rattan was dismissed from the faculty a year ago. Evidently the exigencies of politics have demanded that the practice of economy be discontinued.

The Wives Like Gotham

A long time ago Joe Redding said he only staid in New York that he might make money to live in San Francisco. And Tom McCaleb has often given voice to a similar assertion. Hermann Oelrichs long ago said he would rather spend his life here than in New York, and he has given practical illustration of his kindly feeling toward San Francisco. Now comes Francis Burton Harrison, a dyed-in-the-wool New Yorker, and expresses a desire to buy a place in California and spend the rest of his days here. Young Harrison is tired of New York, having found out the shallowness of society, and he likes the simple life we lead here. But Mrs. Harrison prefers New York, which is still a novelty to her though she had a season or two in the Gotham swim before her marriage, and she will not yield to her husband's desire for a Californian home. And from Newport I hear that Peter Martin is nourishing a feeling of heimweh that has turned his hair gray and tinged his erstwhile high spirits with an Hamletian melancholy. He is his wife's abject slave, however, and will probably never come West without her sanction. Mrs. Martin mere is earnestly entreating daughter-in-law Lily to visit us.

A Menlo Park Debutante

Olga Atherton, who will be among "the rosebud garden of girls" this winter, is the adopted daughter of Faxon Atherton, and a niece of Major Rathbone, Mrs. Edward L. Eyre and Mrs. Percy Selby. She will consequently have relatives enough to give functions in her honor. The Atherton clan is remarkably large. Mrs. Faxon Atherton was Miss Adams of Menlo.

Suing for Orphans' Money

Mrs. Richard Sprague with the Wallace family made a hard fight in the Federal court to deprive the orphan asylums of this city of some of the money bequeathed to them by her former husband, J. Mervyn Donahue. Mrs. Sprague inherited nearly half a million dollars from Donahue, and before his death she secured from him a block of downtown business property. That was when she was threatening to sue him for a divorce. After his death she contended that he had bequeathed more to charity than the law allowed, her claim being that two-thirds of the estate being community property the one hundred and fifty thousand which he had bequeathed to charity was in excess of the amount which he was privileged to dispose of. A contest followed, the purpose of which was to determine how much of the estate was community property. Meanwhile complications arose over the legacy of twenty-five thousand dollars bequeathed by Donahue for the erection of the fountain and statuary dedicated to the machinists of San Francisco as a tribute to the memory of his father. Ryland B. Wallace, a brother of Mrs. Sprague, acting, it was supposed, under her power-of-attorney, entered into an agreement to the effect that if the money were paid out of the estate, when it came to a final settlement the amount would not be charged against the sum set aside for charitable purposes. Mrs. Sprague secured about all that she claimed, reduced the amount to be distributed to the asylums to the extent of twenty-one thousand dollars, and failed to allow even the twenty-five thousand dollars paid for the erection of the statuary. It was to recover that sum for the orphan asylums that suit was instituted by Garret McEnerney, as the attorney for Archbishop Riordan.

An Amazing Defence

The strenuousness with which the Spragues resisted the action, and the extremes to which they went to deprive the orphan asylums of the money bequeathed to them, constitute a remarkable chapter in judicial history. The action was originally instituted in the State courts, but the Spragues set up the plea that they are residents of Lousiana, and as a consequence the case was transferred to the Federal jurisdiction. In the State courts two-thirds of the jury may render a verdict, but a unanimous verdict is necessary for a judgment in the Federal court. Attorneys are usually satisfied to try a case before Judge Morrow without a jury, but the Spragues were not. And yet it appears from what was developed on the trial that they had a perfect defence to the action. It was rather an odd defence, and one that many people would hesitate to make, but not so Mrs. Sprague. And, evidently, not so Judge Wallace, her distinguished father. Likewise, not so, Ryland B. Wallace, the son of his father. Mrs. Sprague's defence was that her brother was not acting under her power-of-attorney when he executed that agreement. In other words, he entered into an agreement which he had no right to make.

She Needed the Money

As Ryland B. Wallace is a reputable member of the bar of this city there was some curiosity regarding the position that he would take. Reputable attorneys are not accustomed to executing agreements without authority. Nevertheless he took the witness stand in Judge Morrow's court and swore that he did not have his sister's power-of-attorney when he executed that agreement. His only excuse for deceiving the other attorneys, and even one of the courts, was that he confidently expected to obtain his sister's consent. Naturally this testimony occasioned a great deal of surprise. However the proceedings abounded in surprises, and it will be the theme of discussion in legal circles for many a day. Mrs. Sprague is a very rich woman, and her second husband is a rich man, but she evidently felt that she needed the money. It is unfortunate that she could not have been prevailed upon to refrain from putting her brother in such an embarrassing position. Her father, Judge Wallace, evidently approved of the whole thing, for he was in court consulting with his daughter's counsel. And by the way, in view of the air-tight defence to the Archbishop's claim in behalf of the orphans, the array of counsel for Mrs. Sprague was astonishing. It consisted of Pillsbury & Sutro, Morrison & Co., and Peter F. Dunne, together with Judge Wallace on the side.

Maud—Why, I thought you told me that you had no use for him.

Clara—Yes, but that was before we were engaged. To tell you the truth, I don't think I shall have much use for him after we are married.

Female Editor from Nome

Mrs. Coe has returned from Nome after selling out the paper founded there some years ago by her husband, Cassius Coe, who contracted a fatal illness during his first winter in the Frozen North. Mrs. Coe was formerly Evelyn Lister, and she was one of the bright young newspaper women of the Call staff before her marriage. After her husband's death she conducted his paper successfully. She has had a splendid musical training, having been educated in Italy with Thea Dorre, who sang "Carmen" here in Madame Tavary's company. She now possesses a fortune that enables her to live at her ease, but she expects to make occasional trips to Nome, where she owns the building in which the newspaper she sold is published.

The candor of a woman is sometimes expressed in the cut of her decollete gown.

Hail to the Chef

San Francisco is destined to achieve a higher reputation than ever among epicures. Hermann Oelrichs is resolved to make the cuisine of the new Fairmount famous all over the world, and to that end he has offered the management of the cafe to Sherry of New York. Oelrichs is an expert in gastronomy, and he believes that a good chef is equal to all the other comforts of home. Contemporaneously with the report of the offer to Sherry is the announcement that a chef is coming all the way from Carlsbad to become the dictator of the St. Francis kitchen. It is to be hoped that he has not entered into contract to increase the number of disordered livers that are exported from this city to Carlsbad every year.

That Iron Mine Yarn

The truth is often slow in overtaking a lie. Several years ago, when the Hays brothers became prominent in the political and social circles of San Jose, the report was started that their riches came out of an iron mine which was said to have been located by their mother through spook influence. As the story has been frequently repeated in the daily papers and as it has never been publicly denied, nobody seemed to have any doubt of its authenticity. Recently, Mrs. Hayes-Chynoweth, who is a very religious woman, provoked unpleasant criticism, while inveighing against the follies of the world, by disparaging the frivols indulged at a public function conducted by a woman's club of San Jose. Some of the women resented her sweeping statements, inferring as they did that she disapproved of the character of their function, and thereupon it was remarked that they objected to being dominated by spook influence. There was talk of retaliation, and the story of the teapot tempest was told in the newspapers. I gave some space to it, and incidentally discussed the alleged spiritualistic leanings of the Hayes family. Since then I have been advised that the old iron mine story, which has been in circulation for years, was absolutely without foundation. Indeed I am told that there are no spiritualists in the Hayes family. Not only am I pleased to correct inaccuracies, but also to give publicity to this letter which bears upon the subject:

San Jose, Cal., October 17, 1903.

Editor Town Talk,

Dear Sir: In two recent issues of your paper I noticed certain statements regarding Mrs. Hayes-Chynoweth of Edenvale. As a friend and admirer of hers, I feel it my duty not only to enter a word of protest, but to write a word in explanation. Mrs. Chynoweth I know personally is not a spiritualist, and never has been a spiritualist. No one has taken more pains to denounce the religion of mediumship than she has. Nor has she done anything but good during all the years of her life. She is a simple Christian woman of exceptionally strong character and immovable faith, who, like her Master, goes about doing good. I think I am not wide of the mark when I say that no person in Santa Clara county is more beloved than is Mrs. Hayes-Chynoweth. So many families could rise up and testify to acts of love and charity in times of extreme need, that it seems a pity that any one should find it in their hearts to write anything that could wound her feelings. I am sure that this explanation is all that is required to have the matter set right. As a journalist of many years' honorable standing, I know you will not refuse publicity to this communication. It is a matter of justice to one who has been deeply and grievously wronged.

Yours truly, Mrs. Edwin K. Johnston.

Stevensonia

A Stevenson Club is the very latest literary institution organized for the purpose of collecting information concerning the life and letters of the writer and keeping each other informed of the appearance of Stevensonia from time to time. The Stevenson cult is one of the literary phenomena of the age. The man was not such an unparalleled genius that it is necessary to go to all this trouble to exploit him. Neither his birth, nor his life, nor his death was so obscure that it is obligatory to institute special expeditions to ferret out facts. On the contrary, there is, if anything, altogether too much known about him and his performances. Whenever a periodical runs short of matter of interest we can count on a photograph of Stevenson, solus, or in a group, and we have been treated to reproductions of the envelopes in which certain of his letters were mailed, as well as the streets he traversed. Every saloon in Merchant street claims recognition as the one where the expatriate "called for a mug of ale," and we have even had propositions to reclaim Portsmouth Square, our historical Plaza, from its surroundings of Oriental filth, not because of the events which make it a centre of interest in our pioneer history, but because, forsooth, Stevenson was wont to sprawl his length there in the sun. The whole Stevenson outfit, even to the step-grandson, has made a living out of the connection, and every one who ever had a letter from Robert Louis Stevenson has turned it to good account. If Stevenson is in need of anything in the way of a club it is one that will impose a heavy fine on any member who will mention his name or the name of any of his books, or exhibit a photograph or any other object which will call him to mind. He will never find his true place in literature until he is left alone long enough to settle.

The Roasting of Kipling

From the manner in which literary critics have taken to picking at Kipling, one might imagine that he was subsidized to turn out a large quantity of prose or verse on time, and up to a fixed standard of merit. Every time he ventures into print there goes up a long howl of complaint and dissatisfaction, and just now there is a tendency to compare what he is doing and has done up to his thirty-eighth year with the work of others at that age, and to make a special grievance of it that Kipling is not Swinburne or Tennyson, or some one else. It is not impossible, or even improbable, that Kipling will never again chain the public fancy as he did in those first books, but what then? We have them, and we can read and re-read and re-enjoy his "Plain Tales," and "Soldiers Three," or whatever other volume our own particular favorite happens to be included in. The "Barrack Room Ballads" are not out of print, and for those who enjoy them and do not care for the later verse, they are still available. Perhaps it is true that Kipling began too young and wrote too much to develop staying powers, and again, it is just as likely that he did not. If he had waited until now to write those fascinating tales of India, would he have written them at all? It is on the same principle as complaining in August that the few abortive violets one finds are not like the first spring flowers, and imagining that had the plants held back their store in March and April, there would be superior blossoms in the summer and autumn. If Kipling has given us his best, may we not enjoy that and thank him for the pleasure he has afforded, instead of throwing stones and calling names?

A Critical Estimate

Last week I gave but a casual review of the works exhibited at the Photographic Salon at the Hopkins'. The exhibition contains many noteworthy works which deserve more than mere mention. The committee's selections, however they may have been caviled at by the "turned down" camera artists, were certainly good. The most artistic work of any of the local professionals is that of Wilcox. L. M. Kaiser's "Sands that edge the Ocean" contains some exquisitely soft tones. Walter A. Scott, one of the most active members of the Camera Club, does splendid work; "The Top of the Grade" is one of his best. W. J. Street's "Plowing in Mendocino" and "Through the Fog" are admirable studies. George T. Power has a beautiful "House on the Hill." T. H. Palache's "Weird Giants of Monterey" is worth more than a passing glance. Dr. Bull of Alameda has some dainty bits, and Crandall of Palo Alto shows two fine things, cats and also a panel in brown of fleecy clouds. Blanche Cunningham's prints show the true touch of the artist. Mrs. Jeanne Bennett of Baltimore has some lovely prints. Mr. Burbank's freckled little girl in her mother's gown is a charming and natural pose, as is his study of an old lady. D'Estrella's "Rio Chico" is finely treated. Dassonville's child Margaret is a pretty pose. Ferdinand Frohman's "Soap Suds and Tears" is delightfully true to nature. Eisen, Adelaide Hanscom, Le Breton and Kemp are all well represented.

One of the new chalets added to the Inverness colony is that of Mrs. Emma Shafter Howard. It is one of the most picturesque homes in Inverness.

A Sympathetic Auditor

An amusing incident occurred in Market street the other evening where a street preacher of more zeal than eloquence was busy haranguing quite a large crowd. "What is God?" he asked in thundering tones. Naturally there was no reply, though he seemed to pause for one. "What is God?" he yelled again, and finally, still searching for inspiration, he asked the question for the third time. A half-drunken tramp standing on the outside of the crowd took pity on the preacher.

"Well," said he, in a juicy voice, "I'll be the sucker. What is God?"

A "Perfect Gentleman," Too

The squeamishness of our grandmothers is becoming more old-fashioned every day. Up from Paraiso Springs comes the news that massage is administered there to both sexes by a fine looking young fellow who is described by a society woman as "a perfect gentleman." I hear that many people well known in society have been reducing flesh at Paraiso. Several very charming women who have been losing some of their graceful lines recently went through a course of training down there. They started out in the morning before breakfast, in sweaters, and tramped a long distance, and on their return they bathed and then subjected themselves to the skilful manipulatious of the masseur.

"The Parvenues have fixed up a good pedigree with the aid of old silver, portraits and antique furniture."

"I wonder why they didn't think of buying some old tombstones?"

Gee Gam's Retort

The retort clever was heard in a street car the other night, where some toughs were making it uncomfortable for white-haired Rev. Gee Gam, the Chinese Congregational preacher. Gee Gam wasn't seeking conversation with the whites but it was forced upon him.

"Well," said one of these representatives of the "superior" race, "I don't want to go to Heaven if there are going to be any Chinese there."

To which Gee Gam retorted meditatively, "Oh, well, you'll find plenty of them in the other place."

A Bret Harte Jinks

Though Bret Harte did not leave many friends to mourn him in California, where his early genius was fostered, his literary works are still loved and Charles S. Aiken has chosen him as the subject of his jinks at the Bohemian Club tonight. Mr. Aiken invites his fellow Bohemians to the jinks in these words:

We'll sing, we'll sing a song tonight, to the man of Murderer's Bar.
We'll drink, we'll drink a health to you, our friend, where'er you are:
For ghosts of Bohemia rise once more and chant a siren song.
And lure us to Sierra skies, o'er trails where you belong.
We'll think of pines and prospect pans, of life at Poverty Flat.
And we see the spot at Sandy Bar where Tennessee's partner sat.

We'll sing, we'll dream, of days long gone, and watch the camp fire glow,
And hear that tale of Little Nell its wondrous charm bestow;
While Truthful James and William Nye throw down their hands and rise
To make surrounding atmosphere resound with Ah Sin's cries;
And old John Burns of Gettysburg lifts his white hat to greet
The twins of Table Mountain, when they 're shooting up the street.

The years, the years, they will not wait—gone are the days of gold;
Outcasts of Poker Flat were we, but for the tales you told;
With you we ring the Angelus and touch the farther past;
Your skilful hand the pictures drew,—our sunset dream and last:
And ghosts of Bohemia rise once more, and chant a siren song.
And lure us to Sierra skies, o'er trails where you belong.

Chorus—
O, it's hoo, hoo, hoo!
And it's wow, wow, wow!
For the owl and coyote!
For the whiskey hot,
And the man who shot
A hole in Sandy McGee!

Dr. H. J. Stewart, Will Irwin, Joaquin Miller, Charlie Field, Bank Somers, L. Maynard Dixon, Bob Aitken, Dr. J. Frank Shiels, Tom Rickard, Harry Melvin, Clarence Wendell and others will be on the program.

Barred Out the Men

The women students of the University of California never gave a "jolly" or a "jinks" out of which they harvested so much fun as they did out of the recent masquerade given in Hearst hall. All sorts of precautions were taken to bar any man from gaining admission by disguising himself in a deceptive costume. And so it was that in making sure that those with admission cards were genuine co-eds the merry-makers had almost as much fun as they did later on in the rout on the floor. The girls claim that no Peeping Tom was anywhere inside the building. Their argument is that if one had gained admission "he'd be sure to brag about it, and so far there hasn't been one single claim that a man was there." Every conceivable character that could possibly rise in the raging nightmare of a college girl's dream was in the procession. But the grotesques that attracted the most attention were the "football," the "tamale" and the "college pennants." The "football" was simply a self-controlled girl encased in a gigantic brown covering all padded out in oval shape and duly laced up on one side to resemble the famous pigskin. Two little feet twinkled from the base of the peripatetic leather. How she ever managed to dance is a mystery, but she did. For that matter, where in this wide world is the burdensome or awkward material that can stop any girl from dancing when she has made up her mind to trip the light fantastic? It was the same with the "tamale." She looked as though it was difficult for her to creep, but when the music struck up she was off as light as a piece of thistle-down. The "college pennants" was a gown all a-flutter with college colors the world over and all happily and harmoniously blended. The dance was interrupted for a short vaudeville program. Among the numbers given was the big favorite of the last Freshie's Gym. Jinks, "Hanki-Panki-Poo." For the occasion Miss Sophie Treadwell specially wrote the words and music of a new song, "She Wasn't Sufficiently Urged." It scored the hit on the bill. It ought to have done so with such a title on such an occasion.

"You say that their courtship was begun on an automobile trip to San Jose and that they came to an understanding before they reached that town. Rather quick work, wasn't it?"

"Oh, no; you see, they had a break-down, and it was a moonlight night."

Handling Hysterical Crowds

The mental condition of a big crowd under suppressed excitement is past finding out. I couldn't help noticing that fact on board the ferry boat Oakland last week, on the return trip following her collision with the Newark. The boat was fairly jammed with passengers; they were even pressing against the chains connecting the outer jack-staffs, for double trains of commuters had reached the wharf during the Oakland's delay in the fog off Goat Island. Almost the whole boatload was under the stress of strong emotion, so strong, in fact, that before she cast off a score or more of them struggled to get back to the wharf. All of these "cold feet," as the others called them, were typical family men and they didn't want to take any chance—not of another collision—but of the danger sure to ensue in such a jam should a thoughtless one become hysterical and start a stampede. I saw a case of that kind once on board this same ferry boat, Oakland, and I don't wonder that some people fear an hysterical crowd that a cry impels to mad rushes.

Had To Beat Madness Out of Them

It happened during the time the new union depot was being built. The Oakland had pulled out some thousand yards from the slip when by some chance a big piece of pile became entangled in one of her paddle-wheels. As the loaded wheel revolved there followed such a tremendous battering, pounding and smashing of timbers that a frightened landsman could jump only to the conclusion that the machinery was somehow trying to tear its way through the bottom of the vessel. "We're sinking!" shouted a panic-stricken passenger, making a rush for the doors on the lower deck. Instantly each one was fighting madly to get through the doorway first. There is no telling how many might have been killed or crippled had not the deck-hands realized what was the matter and kept their heads. "We're all right," they shouted, "go back; it's nothing but a break in the wheel," and with their hands they tried to wave the crowd back, but they might as well have tried to stay the winds. The crowd would have swept over them and many, in their frenzy, would undoubtedly have jumped overboard, had not the doughty deck-hands punched right and left at those in front of them. They didn't hesitate, either, to bruise the faces of the most obstreperous. After the paddle-wheel was stopped and the excited passengers were made to realize what had been the matter they went to the other extreme and became hysterical with joy. Numbers of the wildest tore down the life preservers, strapped them on, and paraded up and down the decks, arm in arm, just as they did right after the recent collision when they realized that there was no danger.

Showed His True Character

There was a bit of family tragedy happened on this same occasion I speak of. A well-known lawyer here in town, his wife and little child were sitting outside when the sounds of smashing timbers vibrated through the vessel, and every heart stopped beating for the moment under the firm conviction that the boat was sinking. This man turned pale, jumped up, seized a life preserver and rushed for the rail, where he stood prepared to jump overboard and save himself at the first lurch of the vessel. When he realized that there was no danger, he dropped the life preserver and walking back to his wife he extended his hand to pat her on the shoulder reassuringly, as he said, "Well, there was no danger after all, my dear." She shrank back from him and pressed her child closer to her side. "Don't," she said, "don't ever touch me again. This ends it between us." And she got up and walked away from him. She kept her word, too, for the same week she began proceedings for a divorce.

An Impossible Business

It is not generally known that Mrs. Henry T. Scott has a well developed sense of humor. On her recent trip from New York to Liverpool, there were among the passengers a wealthy young bachelor of this city and two young ladies whose father made his money in the restaurant business. Though they do not yet bear the brand of the elect they are rapidly "getting there." The bachelor is an acquaintance of Mrs. Scott, and thinking it would be pleasant for the girls to meet her, he asked if he might present them. "Oh, dear me, no," was the reply, "I never could recognize them in San Francisco. Their father, you know, was in an impossible business." The bachelor is still abroad, but he wrote about the incident to a friend of his in this city, who remarked that it was another sample of Mrs. Scott's delicious humor.

Irwin Has Arrived

Wallace Irwin has been heard from. He is writing skits and comical lyrics for Weber & Felds. He tried his hand at that sort of thing out here, but failed to receive proper inspiration. In the broader field of New York events of great moment are of such frequent occurrence that the popular satirist is never at a loss for themes. Irwin's reputation had preceeded him to New York for his "Hoodlum Sonnets" had a big sale in the East.

Family Talent Galore

Will Irwin, the Sunday editor of the Chronicle and one of the rising young lights of the literary west, is the father of a ten-pound boy born last week. Young Irwin should be an interesting chap, for his parents are overflowing with the artistic temperament. His mother is the youngest of the Hyde sisters, all of whom have artistic ability of no mean order. Mrs. Irwin is also a Stanford woman who specialized in mathematics and who has histrionic ability. With this strain on his mother's side, combined with his father's cleverness in letters which is shared by Wallace Irwin, the little chap's uncle, the latest scion of the house of Irwin should turn out something interesting and important. However, sometimes rare abilities on both sides of the house seem to neutralize each other and produce only a "nice boy" or girl, good for nothing in a pre-eminent degree. Let us hope for the best.

The Petrel's Commander

The little gunboat Petrel, the first gunboat of the "new" Navy, has been placed in commission again at the Mare Island Navy Yard, under the command of Lieutenant-Commander Benjamin Tappan, and both ship and commander are to return to the scene of their former prowess on the Asiatic station. Both took part in the battle of Manila bay, and after that historic fight Tappan was given the command of one of the small vessels captured from the Spanish—I think it was the Manila. In this small vessel Tappan, during the subsequent operations, including the advance upon the city of Manila, was conspicuous for the closeness with which he approached the enemy's batteries. He always made it a practice to get his guns as close to the enemy as he could, wholly regardless of the fact that such tactics also brought him closer to the hostile weapons. Tappan was Admiral Casey's flag-lieutenant on the Wisconsin at Panama this time last year, and he had not a little to do in the delicate intermediary negotiations that brought to a close the last Colombian revolution. He is a fine fellow and a fine officer as well.

Going on a Long Cruise

The officers of the Pacific squadron which left this port last Thursday, made social hay while the sun shone during their brief stay here. The squadron is going on one of the longest cruises it has taken for some time, and families and friends of the departing ones are grieving sorely. The vessels will be gone for the greater part of the winter, I am told, on a cruise to the South, during which they will visit the Mexican and Central American coasts, the Hawaiian and perhaps other islands within the squadron's territory.

The Eccentric Newcomb

The assignment of Professor of Mathematics, T. J. J. See, to the observatory at Mare Island, reminds me that there is another naval professor, who is sui generis. I refer to Professor Simon Newcomb, whose fame as a mathematician is world-wide. So entirely absorbed is Newcomb in the large subjects of science, and so devoted is he to his pet hobby of the elimination of the unessential, that his taciturnity is at times humorous. In a recent magazine article he depicted a stage of the world when everything became so well-known and so commonplace that for a few days at a time the morning paper laid on the breakfast table contained nothing but the bare statement: "Nothing worthy of note has occurred since our last issue." That was directly in line with Newcomb's trend of thought. I remember an incident at a tea given in Washington at the Newcomb home by the professor's daughter, Anita, now Mrs. W. J. McGee, who inherits much of her father's scientific propensity, and has even achieved much fame herself in researches into the hazardous region of stirpiculture. Newcomb, at this tea, was silently wandering among the guests, with a bored look, and not vouchsafing so much as a monosyllable to any of them. Mrs. McGee reproached him for his gloomy silence. His only reply was: "I have nothing new to impart." Then he went his way.

To Improve the Course

It has taken the Navy Department a long time to wake up to the folly perpetrated some years ago when the two courses of navigation and engineering respectively were combined at Annapolis. From the late "sixties" until the passage of the silly Robeson bill of 1882, there were but two classes of cadets at the Naval Academy, the cadet-midshipmen, destined for the Line, and the cadet-engineers, destined for the Engineer corps. The Robeson bill, in addition to its other iniquitous provisions, blended the two, and forced all the studies and exercises into the four-year curriculum. The result was harmful to both, and the engineering course suffered particularly, as a consequence of which the officers graduated of late have been, as a rule, anything but competent engineers. Had it not been for the practical experience and ability of the warrant machinists who have been standing most of the engine room watches in our new warships, it is highly probable that the list of mishaps to machinery would have been longer than it has been. I see now that the Navy Department has organized a board composed of Captain George A. Converse, Commander J. H. Perry, and Lieutenant Cleland Davis, to formulate a plan for the special training of officers for the engineering duties of the Navy. Such a system is necessary. The duties of the Line and of the Engineer Corps are difficult and complex enough to constitute separate professions by themselves, and the effort to make a man expert at both is ridiculous.

Deceived by a Militiaman

All the officers of the San Francisco division of the California Naval Militia are not content with masquerading as sailors and "veterans" for spectacular purposes. I have just learned that one officer has been splurging socially under false colors, thereby winning favors that would not otherwise have been extended to him. This militiaman, a few weeks ago, made a yachting trip in southern waters, visiting among other places, the fashionable resorts of Catalina and Santa Monica, where the ennuyed fair ones were eager to entertain gallant officers of the United States navy. The militiaman generously gave them the desired thrill by posing as a lieutenant of the navy "on sick leave." He managed to work up considerable feminine interest in himself, and he was entertained extensively. It was not until some days ago that a few of his hosts and hostesses learned that they had been duped. It is said that on one occasion he displayed what he said was his Annapolis class ring. "In what class did you graduate?" he was asked. "Oh," he responded, gaily, "if I told you that you would know my age, you see!"

"I suppose he made his money honorably."

"Oh, yes, he got a corner some years ago in one of the necessaries of life."

A Surprise in Jewish Social Circles

The announcement of the engagement of Milton Bremer, son of W. H. Bremer, the stock and bond broker, with Miss Bartholomew, took away the breath of many people in the inner circles of Jewish society. To say that it caused a profound sensation would be to put it mildly. For a long time Milton Bremer has been looked upon as a most desirable "catch" by more than one match-making mamma, and I believe that one charming young woman, the daughter of a very wealthy merchant, flattered herself that he was actually engaged in formulating a proposal to her. However, if so, her calculations were not well founded, for young Mr. Bremer has long been an ardent admirer of Miss Bartholomew, who is a strikingly handsome young woman with an exquisite figure. But the sensation in Jewish social circles was not due so much to the fact that Bremer failed to satisfy the yearnings of certain charming young women as to the circumstance of his having been won by one who was not of his set. Miss Bartholomew has been employed as a saleslady in a cloak store. In addition to her pulchritude she has many fine qualities of mind and heart, and therefore Bremer is to be congratulated even though he didn't propose to the heiress.

Mrs. Blingum (Just back from Europe): "No, I didn't enjoy myself abroad and I'm never going again."

Mr. Newrich: "Why not?"

Mrs. Blingum: "Why, I didn't meet anybody over there except some breezy Americans who bored me to death."

Koshland's Experience

After spending a small fortune on a beautiful residence it is decidedly unpleasant to have somebody proceed to erect unsightly flats on an adjoining lot. Flats have depreciated the value of many a fine residence in this city. Mr. Koshland, the wealthy wool merchant, who is just finishing one of the most superb residences on Presidio Heights, was threatened with having his beautiful place ruined and it cost him nine thousand dollars for protection. The adjoining lot was bought by a man who announced his intention to erect flats, and Koshland immediately began negotiations for the purchase of the property. The lot, I hear, was worth about four thousand dollars, but when an offer was made for it by Koshland the owner demanded an exorbitant sum. Koshland indignantly refused to pay, but later on he changed his mind. Then the owner raised the price, and Koshland once more refused. Later on he again agreed to pay the price, and once more it was raised. Finally the owner had plans drawn for his flats, and started the erection of the building. Then Koshland came to the owner's terms and secured the property for nine thousand dollars.

Secret Marriage in San Jose

There was consternation in the palatial home of H. H. Main, in San Jose last week, when his daughter Hazel revealed the fact that she had been following the latest San Francisco fashion, by secretly marrying Louis Colombet. For several months E. C. Brunhouse, a rising young business man of San Jose, had been paying her devoted attention, and it was pretty generally believed that they were to be married. The old folks looked with favor on the suit of young Brunhouse, and they had objections to Colombet. But Dan Cupid has little regard for the wishes of parents. Last Saturday the daughter of the house of Main announced that she had been wedded for several days to Colombet, a Justice of the Peace having performed the ceremony. This is the second secret marriage in the Main family. Miss Bertha, a younger sister, eloped with W. A. Meyer.

Service Gossip

Major Stephenson and Captain Frederick Johnston will divide the bouquets at Presidio functions this winter. Captain Johnston has held the belt for some time, but the Major is expected to make a close fight for it. The Presidio will be gayer than usual this year, for the newly arrived officers of the Tenth Infantry, those of the Artillery Corps and the Cavalry are already uniting in laying plans for dances a little more elaborate than the "Presidio hops." As the Army is still attractive to girls of the civilian sets, invitations to the dances will likely be at a premium. There will be a lot of Army brides, however, to dispute belleship with the unmarried.

Major and Mrs. Leon S. Roudiez, who made so many friends here during their long station at Angel Island, returned recently from Manila where they have been since our acquisition of the Philippines. Mrs. Roudiez, who has been very ill, is recuperating. Their next station is to be at Fort Reno, Oklahoma. Captain J. E. Cole, Sixth Cavalry, and Mrs. Cole left for their new post, Fort Meade, N. D., last Thursday. They were the recipients of many social attentions during their stay from the old friends of Mrs. Cole, who spent two years at the Presidio when she was Nan Marshall. She is the daughter of Colonel J. M. Marshall, who was then quartered in San Francisco.

They Were Schoolmates

The Clary sisters will spend the winter in town with their parents. The family home in Stockton has been rented, and they will stay at the Occidental during the season. They are great friends of the Voorhies family. Mrs. Clary and Mrs. Voorhies attended the same school in Maryland, an old-time seminary where Southern girls of good family were educated. I am surprised that some Eastern magazine writer has not devoted space to this famous school, which was attended by young women of historic name, many of whom are now prominent in the Daughters of the Confederacy and Daughters of the American Revolution.

The Voorhies Girls

Mrs. Malcolm Henry will spend the winter here with her parents, Dr. and Mrs. A. H. Voorhies. Mrs. Henry was Kate Voorhies, the second of four daughters. Marie, the eldest, is the only unmarried one of the sisters. Anna married Tom Bishop and Leila, Lieutenant Guy Scott. Marie is the devoted chum of her father, and one often sees her out walking with him. She goes in for charity a good deal, and is a most generous though inconspicuous giver. She is a clever girl, and has ideas in house decoration that would make her a good living were her parents willing for her to choose an independent career.

Wheeler Was Converted

Miss Jessica Peixotto has been installed at Berkeley as an instructor in philosophy. President Wheeler is said to be opposed to the employment of female pedagogues in the university, but Regent Reinstein converted him to the cause of Miss Peixotto who is very highly esteemed in Jewish circles. I have heard, by the way, that Regent Reinstein expects to secure some very large donations to the university.

The Hysterical Press

The daily papers were never quite so hysterical as they are in this campaign. They are making this the liveliest municipal campaign that was ever held in San Francisco. But the man in the street doesn't appear to be taking them seriously. They fail to exercise any perceptible influence on the betting. The Lane organs are making the most noise, hurling the fiercest invective and throwing the most mud, but all the while the Democratic candidate appears to be losing ground. As a last resort they have begun interviewing prominent cits who think that Lane should be elected. One of the enthusiastic Lane men, according to the Bulletin, is Dr. C. F. Buckley, who was so bitterly opposed to the election of Joe Tobin last year on account of his personal grudge against the whole Tobin family. I believe he was writing letters to the Bul-

The duck shooting season has opened most auspiciously and all of the hunters are reporting most satisfactory results. To the keen sportsman what can be more delightful than to turn out of his warm blankets in the early dawn of a foggy morning when birds are plentiful and flying low, to return at night tired, wet, yet withal happy on account of the size of his bag, and then to take a warm bath, clean dry clothes, an excellent dinner at the club house with game of his own shooting, and washed down by a quart of Ayala as the piece de resistance. To such a one life for the moment has nothing further to offer.

The Ferocious Editor

Apropos the ferocity of the press in this campaign, Town Talk's freak odesmith hammered his muse until the following lines were wrought. They are addressed to "The Ferocious Editor":

What's this
I see?
Ah, what bliss!
A candidate for office!
Now's the Springtime
Of our jubilation
Made glorious
By this

A worthy sacrifice
He,
To lend
Eclat
To a journalistic holiday.
Ah!
He smiles!
Smash the caitiff job-chaser.
Forthwith bring
The Mephitic Slander
From his fetid cage,
And let Him rage,
And roar,
And snarl.
Unleash
The Bloodhounds of Libel,
And lash
Them
To frenzied passion;
For here's an impudent job-seeker
Intent
On serving the people.
Swift
The penalty shall be.
Now for the

In Financial Circles

Another dull and uneventful week in the local investment market, transactions on "The Stock & Bond Exchange" aggregating $109,000 in bonds, and 1,812 shares of stocks, divided in 335 Lighting stocks, 812 Spring Valley Water Co., 215 miscellaneous and 450 Sugar shares.

The Bond market has evidently suffered by the continued depression of the Eastern markets, first grade Eastern bonds having declined steadily, making their rate of income appreciably higher than that of ours here. Another reason may be assigned to the activity of the Real Estate market, which removes the Savings Banks from the column of investors.

Transactions in Stocks are ridiculously light. It seems to me the brokers ought to be up and doing something. There are a number of local corporations whose stocks ought to be listed, as it is at present the material dealt in is too limited.

The news of the formation of a rival lighting company published by one of the dailies had no effect on the price of the stock of the S. F. Gas & Electric Company. It was not taken seriously. Prices as a whole were well sustained; there was no pressure to sell. —The Financier.

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO, STATE OF CALIFORNIA

In the Matter of the Estate of LAWRENCE FELVEY, Deceased

CATHERINE FELVEY, administratrix of the estate of Lawrence Felvey, deceased, having filed herein her verified petition praying for an order granting leave to sell real estate of said decedent for the reasons and purposes therein set forth, and good cause appearing therefor,

IT IS ORDERED by said Court that all persons interested in the estate of said deceased, appear before said Superior Court, Department 9 thereof, on the 23rd day of November, 1903, at the hour of 10 o'clock A. M., of that day at the Court room of said Department of said Court at the City Hall in said City and County, then and there to show cause, if any there be, why an order should not be granted to the said administratrix to sell so much of the real estate of said deceased, at either private sale or public auction, as she shall deem best and as shall be necessary to pay the debts and expenses of administration, accrued and to accrue, and the family allowance in said estate, and that a copy of this order be published at least four successive weeks in Town Talk, a newspaper of general circulation, printed and published in said City and County.

Dated, October 20th, 1903. J. V. COFFEY, Judge of said Court.

The Road of a Great Desire

There are bridges, once crossed, that 'twere wise to burn
On the road of A Great Desire,
There are havens of rest that 'twere well to spurn,
There's the touch of a hand we may not return;
Place all longings, but one, on Ambition's pyre
Ye who travel the road of A Great Desire.

There are faces so young and with hearts so old
On the road of A Great Desire,
In their eyes lie the shadows of hopes untold;
Though the pulses beat swift yet the blood is cold,
For they know but the lust of Ambition's fire
They that travel the way of A Great Desire.

There's a shrine bathed in warmth of the world's caress
On the road of A Great Desire,
It is reached through the valley of Weariness
And the god of the temple is called Success;
Lay the dreams you have known on its altar fire
Ye who 've traveled the way of A Great Desire.

The Collaborators

A modern version of a scene from Dickens.

"I am so glad," said Dora, "that I can help you in your work, dearest."

"So am I, darling," answered David Copperfield, kissing his little wife's rosy lips, "and I'm sure this historical novel will be the best of best sellers. Now read me what you 've written, pet."

Dora hunted through her work until she found the sheets of scented note-paper on which she had recorded her contribution to the great novel she and David had planned during the treacle-moon.

"But why, sweetness," asked David, "didn't you write on the copy paper I gave you? I never heard of using scented note paper—with a crest on, at that—for manuscript."

"Oh, I couldn't bear the sight of that ugly brown paper," said Dora, with a fetching pout.

"But that ugly brown paper is what I write all my stories on," returned David.

"That doesn't make any difference. You know, old darling, you 're only a man. A woman likes to do things her own way."

Pause, during which a few kisses are exchanged.

"Now," said Dora disengaging herself from David's embrace, "if you don't let me read you what I've written we'll never in this wide world get to our novel."

David resigns himself to listen.

"'Queen Elizabeth,'" read Dora, puckering her brows over her rather illegible chirography, "'was sitting in the midst of a crowd of courtiers. She was engaged in the task of manicuring her beautiful finger-nails. No other woman of her time had such exquisite hands as Elizabeth. Long, slim and taper-fingered, they were a poem, a dream. They had inspired Raleigh, Leicester and Essex to indulge in verse-making. And the Queen used nothing but gold instruments for her manicuring. Her scissors were of gold; her file of course was steel but with a gold handle. Her polisher had a gold back—'"

"But, my pet," interrupted David, "I don't believe they had manicure instruments in Elizabeth's time."

"Don't believe?" exclaimed Dora, with asperity, "Do you know?"

"I have no authorities to support my supposition," answered David, "but I should judge that the instruments, if they had any, would be of the crudest."

"Should judge! Well, I feel sure that a dainty, beautiful creature like Elizabeth would have the very latest things for her lovely hands."

"But, my own wife, it is absurd to begin a book like that. People would think it a josh, like Mark Twain's fake history."

Dora stamped her pretty foot.

"Josh! I'd like to see anybody call my book a josh."

"Your book, my love? Why, I thought we were going to col laborate on it. Our book, you should say."

"Well, if you begin to pick flaws in my work I'll write the whole thing myself."

"But, Dora sweet, one should try to be accurate in an historical novel."

"I don't care a rap for accuracy. Who cares anything about old history and things? What we must do is to make our heroine attractive."

"But she wasn't. You know Elizabeth was never called a beauty."

"Well, she shall be a beauty in my book."

"Our book, darling."

Dora took her sheets of scented note-paper and tore them to bits.

"There! I'll not write a book at all. Do it yourself if you think you can write a better one. Put your old history in, if you like."

"Dearest"—David's tone was very tender, "I never knew my little love had a temper."

Dora burst into tears. She put her golden head on his waistcoat and sobbed into his shirt-bosom.

"You're so mean and cruel, David," she sobbed, "why, I wrote lovely essays at school, and I thought I could be such a—such a h-h-elp to y-y-o-ou in your work. And you say I don't know anything—that I-I-'m a f-f-ool."

David was able to cope with the difficulty. He needed no arms, for his were clasped about the weeping figure.

"Don't cry, pet," he said, "we'll leave that old book and begin another. We'll write a love story—the history of our own courtship."

Dora smiled through her tears.

"There'll be no difficulty about making that accurate, will there, dear?" she said.

The Important Problem

Mrs. Jones—Here is an article in the Sunday Supp on "How To Hold The Wife You Have Won."

Mr. Jones—That's just the way with those Sunday Supp. writers; always telling people what they don't care to know. The problem that confronts most men is how to lose the wife that has been won.

Mrs. Jones—Are you one of that class?

Mr. Jones had been speaking in an absent-minded manner but his wife's question brought him to his senses, and by way of reply he kissed her tenderly.

Our Beautiful Designs

are now town talk. Our jewelry has become popular for the beautiful and artistic effect which is not exceeded in the genuine diamonds themselves and are worn by lovers of the beautiful, regardless of their comparative inexpensiveness.

The Alexandra manufactured diamonds are cut and faceted to even a higher lustre than the real stones themselves and may be detected from the more expensive jewelry only by the eye of an expert.

The pearls are manufactured from a composition of fishskin and silver, and are so genuine in appearance as to defy detection.

Was the Idol of London

It was some months since that a returned San Franciscan told me of the "crystal gazing parties" over which fashionable London had gone temporarily mad. Andrew Lang started the craze, and it raged for an indefinite period, the prices of crystals meanwhile going up to an exorbitant figure. Madame Livorno, the crystal gazer, became the rage and her readings from the crystals, with her wonderful palm delineations, were enjoyed by the Royal family, and lesser nobilities, as well as distinguished authors and musicians, stars of the stage, diplomats and Army and Navy officials. She read the palms of Queen Victoria, Princess Christian, the Duke and Duchess of York—now Prince and Princess of Wales—the Princess Clementine of Belgium and Grand Duke Sergius of Russia, and her presence at a smart function was sure to make it a success. Later she went to the Far East, where she met the Viceroy of India, the Maharajah of Kapurthala and the Gaekwar of Baroda, and increased her fame and collection of mementoes. Madame Livorno arrived in San Francisco the other day, and society will now be adding "crystal gazing parties" to the program of the winter's gayeties. She is at the California hotel, where I had difficulty in seeing her, her fame having already spread abroad and the reception room being filled with waiting clients. She has been bombarded by interviewers, yet received me very graciously. Though she has traveled all over the world and met all kinds of people, she said she considers San Franciscans among the most charming and cordial of all.

The famous chiromant and crystal gazer is a beautiful woman, with reddish brown hair and a complexion as soft, pink and white as an infant's. She has the delicately modulated, even English voice that is always such a pleasure to hear, and her manner is sweet and gracious. I asked her about the crystal gazing that London went wild over, and she said it was a very simple thing. "No, everybody cannot see pictures in the crystals," she said, "but they think of what they wish to see, and I look in the crystal and the picture forms itself there. One needs no dark room," she added to another question, "but a dark cloth is placed back of the crystal and the effect is like a photograph."

Madame Livorno is not only one of the fortunate elect who can decipher occult messages; it is as a chiromant that she has attained her greatest fame. Indeed, even Cheiro has not a wider vogue abroad, and in Mexico I have heard that her visit was accorded the enthusiasm evoked by royalty. She has just finished a season in the latter country, and while there read the hands of President Diaz and his family, and those of all the leading diplomats. She has some interesting photographs and letters in her collection of souvenirs. One of the most interesting to Americans is that of Captain Sigsbee of the Maine, who found her reading of his hand "remarkably clever." She also has letters from Rear Admiral Greer, U. S. N., Sir Thomas Lipton, the Crown Prince of Siam who so lately visited us, and Mrs. Roosevelt, and autographed photographs from William Gillette, Helen Redmond and other American stage stars.

"How interesting it would be," I suggested, "if you would let the public know some of the things you discovered in those hands."

But Madame Livorno did not see the matter in that light. She said that would be a breach of confidence. Nevertheless, I could not help wishing that she would compile a book of reminiscences. What delightful reading would such a volume make! Her experience in Mexico, a birds-eye view of which was vouchsafed me in this brief interview, would alone constitute valuable literary material. It appears that Madame Livorno did not know the identity of her illustrious clients, the President of the Republic, Senora Carmen Diaz, his wife, and Senora Amada Diaz de la Torre, his daughter, when they came to her for readings, but they did not remain long in cog. After the delineations they were so delighted that they introduced themselves.

One would like to know, too, what were the characteristics that she found in the palms of the children of the Princess of Wales, which so pleased their royal mother. "Your delineation of my children's characteristics was wonderfully accurate," she wrote to Madame Livorno.

"Do you believe one can exactly determine the time of death by the life-line in the palm?"

Though people were waiting, I determined to ask this question, one that the amateur palmist finds hardest to answer.

"The approach of disease can be determined," was the reply, "and warded off by this knowledge."

She then told me that she had spent two years in hospital work, for the purpose of finding out the manner in which the various diseases assert themselves in the lines of the palms, and in the finger-nails. From her observations in this special training Madame Livorno declared and demonstrated that she is able to detect the presence of tuberculosis and other diseases, as shown in the hand. It is not a mere theory of hers, but a practical demonstration of her discoveries when a student of the hands of patients in the hospital. I wished for another half-hour in which to hear more on this subject, which physicians as well as laymen must find of absorbing interest. But with those clients waiting—well, I had to bid Madame Livorno a reluctant au revoir.

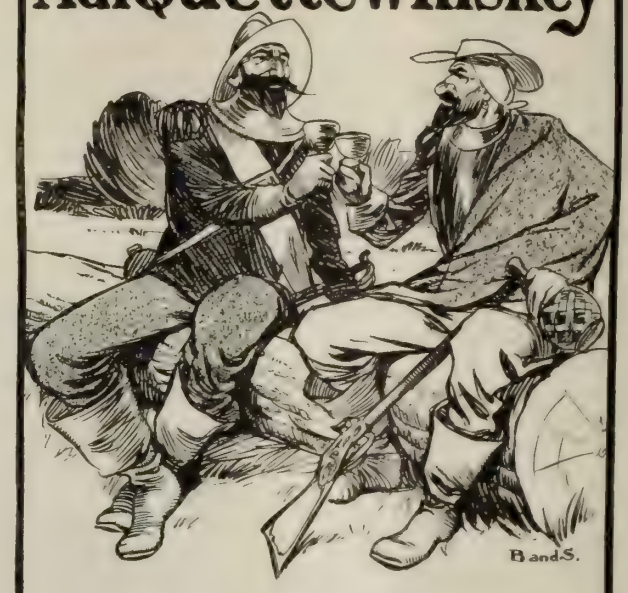
Lawrence Martin.

The Stage

Soldiers of Fortune

The genuine, every-day, South American revolution is a theme pregnant with material for the play-builder, and I am surprised that more of them have not been dramatized. They should inspire not only the writer of melodramas, but also the farce-comedy writer and comic opera librettist. Richard Harding Davis discerned the possibilities for fiction writing with which those constantly recurring upheavals are fraught, and the result was his charming little story which Augustus Thomas dramatized, and in which Robert Edeson is now starring. All things considered, Mr. Thomas did excellent work. "Soldiers of Fortune" is a stirring combination of straight comedy and sublimated melodrama. The first two acts are comedy pure and simple, and they are most enjoyable. There is an effervescent vein of humor running through them, and the dialogue is sparkling and wholesome. Your interest is seized in the first act, and as the plot develops you are carried along with it until the revolution breaks out in the third , and then you begin to feel that it behooves you to become passive and keep in mind the fact that it is a South American revolution you are witnessing, and that therefore you should not take it with greater seriousness than it is apparently regarded by the hero, who is inclined to view it with complacency. There were some very stirring incidents in the revolution, but no serious damage was done. The President's palace is invaded, but only one man is killed. The hero is never alarmed, though he faces some very treacherous-looking fellows, and even the women stay in the picture. The hero is at all times as unruffled as was Sherlock Holmes in the most trying situations. Nevertheless your interest is keyed up, and you follow the fortunes of the insouciant hero to the very end. Robert Edeson is a new luminary in the theatrical firmament, this being his first season, I believe, as a star. He is a capable actor, and is well suited to the role of Robert Clay. Indeed he plays it as though it were written for him. He has good support in all the important roles, and Ellen Berg is especially effective as Hope Langham. It is surprising to see this little woman impersonating a girl not out of her teens but she does so successfully. And yet Ellen Berg was not an inexperienced actress when she appeared in this city in the early eighties. Dorothy Tennant hasn't much to do as Alice Langham, but she smokes a cigarette effectively. She blows the smoke through her nose without inhaling it, and does other things in imitation of mere man. The MacWilliams of Harry Harwood is a breezy impersonation, and Helen Ware plays Madame Alvarez as though she had a few drops of Castilian blood in her veins.

Verdi Night at the Tivoli



All Little Italy was gathered together at the Tivoli last Tuesday night to do honor to its maestro—Verdi. Five-sixths of the audience were Italians who shook the house with their lusty bravos. A box party consisting of the new Italian Consul, Count Gremani and his friends, gave official dignity to the scene. Agostini and De Spada, who sang in the first act of "Traviata," which opened the long program, watched the remainder of the performance from a lower box and were conspicuous for the enthusiasm they expressed for the other singers. Benedetto and Gregoretti were given more of a chance than the others to show their voices in the difficult arias of Verdi. Benedetto appeared as Aida and Leonora in "Trovatore" but was heard to best advantage in a scene from "Il Forza de Destino." I have heard Gregoretti when he was in better voice but he made a big sensation by his singing in "Il Forza." Dado sang the big solo from "Nabucco" in his usual artistic manner and was obliged to give an encore. The fourth act from "Rigoletto" was given with the boy tenor Tedeschi as the Duke and Tromben as Gilda.

Tedeschi is singing Rudolpho in "Boheme" this week and Agostini watches his performance with great interest from the audience. Taking into consideration the fact that the young tenor is new to the role, his interpretation is quite wonderful. Except for a tendency to force his tones his singing is delightful.

From Pinero to Fitch

Miller Kent appeared in "The Cowboy and the Lady" at the California some seasons back, but the play as presented at the Alcazar is a much more worthy production than that given by the Eastern road company. It is a clever comedy, not without an emotional note to its humor, and it contains some farcical touches that are in the real old-time Fitch vein. The cocktail scene in the first act is very natural, and the Colorado background is most effective. There is something of the picturesque flavor of Owen Wister's "Virginian" about the characters, and the company manages to retain this flavor in interpretation. Marie Howe is particularly good as Miss Prissims, the old-maid pianist at the dance hall, and the predicament in which her tight shoes figure would move a grave-digger to laughter. Miss Block has a much better chance to assert her individuality in this play than in her part of last week. She plays Mrs. Weston with some fine touches. Miss Belgarde is scarcely recognizable in the character of Molly Larkins. She has played society women so long that it seems incredible that she can so well conceal her identity in that of the tough proprietor of the dance hall, but she does it in a thoroughly artistic manner. Mr. Durkin is sympathetic as the Harvard cowboy. This new leading man has a voice that is capable of rarely tender expression.

The Alcazar's Future

The triumph of the Alcazar's new stock players has been swift and emphatic. Never before, in the history of the theatre, have newcomers established themselves in popular regard to swiftly and surely. The inaugural fortnight has shown them in society play and Western comedy drama, and a third turn of the kaleidoscope next week will reveal their adaptability to the purely romantic. Interest in a stock company too often centres in one or two people. In this instance it is fairly divided between a leading man of dignity and distinction; a leading woman of talent and rare taste in dress; an ingenue of temperament and appealing tenderness, and a comedian who is an artist to his finger-tips. It will be interesting to see them in "Under the Red Robe," which has all the elements which quicken the pulse of men and the heart-throbs of women. Very ingeniously constructed by Edward E. Rose, it is based upon a fanciful tale by Stanley Weyman that has commanded as many readers as the most florid fiction of Anthony Hope or the elder Dumas. The matinee girl dotes upon such heroes as Gil de Berault, who carouses, gambles and pricks with rapier point, with the gallantry, grace and airy humor of a D'Artagnan. James Durkin will personate the fascinating swashbuckler; and Adele Block will find her first real dramatic opportunity as the spirited, sensitive but fiery and fearless ward of the great Richelieu. "Under the Red Robe" has but one week allotted, and then begins a month of comedies, to be inaugurated November fourth, with William Gillette's convulsively funny frivolity, "Too Much Johnson."

A New Glory

We have seen "The Christian" in San Francisco so many times that it has ceased to interest the majority of theatre-goers. But I do not think any one should miss seeing the present production at the Grand, chiefly for its Glory. Miss Countiss gives to the Hall Caine heroine the right touch. She is intense at the right time, and that is not what one could say of all the Glory Quayles we have seen. In the powerful scene where John Storm succumbs for an instant to his passion, Miss Countiss rises to the occasion with emphasis. Mr. Willard is an admirable John Storm, too. He does not give us the Morgan version of the role, but his version has points that Morgan missed. The play is splendidly staged, and the support fills all requirements.

At the Grand, beginning tomorrow matinee, will be the much talked of musical comedy, "Spotless Town." In New York, Boston, Philadelphia and Chicago it broke all previous box office farce comedy records, and in each city its season had to be prolonged. "Spotless Town" is a good-natured satire upon Municipal Government. The people of "Spotless Town" enter upon a crusade against dirt, and in their zeal go to a ridiculous extreme. The owner of everything or anything is fined ten dollars for every spot found upon it—even on his dog. Clocked stockings or polka dot waists are subject to the penalty, so that a young lady addicted to fancy fabrics in hosiery or other gear would need the wealth of a Carnegie to indulge in her mania. The troubles of the townspeople are increased by the arrival of two Germans who want to buy the place. Being travel-stained and dirty, they are pounced upon by the entire municipality and hurried to jail.The dilemma of the unfortunate Germans entails a number of amusing complications and situations which have their climax when they are carried through space on the sails of a windmill to escape captivity. The play will be given an excellent cast, the principal features of which will be Leila Shaw, a beautiful girl and a clever and vivacious comedienne who sings charmingly, and our old favorite, Leslie Morosco, who during his long absence has made an enviable reputation in the East.

The Emporium

Back to Melodrama

The Central is reveling in melodrama this week, melodrama in which there is plenty of picturesque material. "Ranch 10" has some scenic effects that dwarf even the pretty toboggan scene of last week. There's a blizzard, for one thing, a snowstorm that makes the audience reach for its wraps and regret that they are not furs. Then there is an explosion that is realistic to its core. Stockwell has a part in which his humor has free vein. Miss Vane has the most striking woman's part, and as Silver Bud is very charming. Miss Lawton as the Massachusetts girl is demure and sweet, and Miss Woodthorpe makes a hit as the old maid. The other parts are all in good hands.

LEILA SHAW

Leila Shaw, a most beautiful girl and a clever and fascinating singing comedienne who has created quite a furor in the East, will be a principal attraction at the Grand Opera House the week beginning tomorrow matinee. Miss Shaw will be seen as Fleur de Lis, a Parisienne serio comique. She will introduce a number of new and catchy songs and will wear several stunning costumes.

Beginning Sunday matinee, November first, the Ellery Royal Italian Band, which made itself so popular last season, will play an engagement for one week only under the management of Will Greenbaum, at the Alhambra. The band has a new leader in Signor Manfredo Chiffairelli, one of Italy's greatest bandmasters and a composer of reputation. He is said to be a most magnetic conductor and draws the most expressive music out of his men. The personnel of the band is about the same as last year, but four new soloists have been added. Signor Decimo, the new solo clarinetist, is said to be the finest in America. The prices will be popular, ranging from fifty cents to one dollar. The sale of seats will open Wednesday morning at Sherman, Clay & Co.'s.

One of the finest programs ever offered here is the opening program for the concert by the Metropolitan Opera House Symphony Orchestra under the direction of J. S. Duss at the Alhambra next Tuesday night. Madame Nordica will sing the Liebestod from "Tristan and Isolde," and the Polonaise from "Mignon." Although down for but two numbers on the program Madame Nordica, with her usual graciousness, always sings a number of encores, with piano accompaniment played by Mr. E. Romayne Simmons, well remembered as her excellent accompanist on her recital tour. The orchestral numbers that are entirely new here are march, "With Pomp and Circumstance," by Edward Elgar, overture "Cricket on the Hearth" by Goldmark, the "Rhapsodie Norwegienne" by Hallen, and Weingaertner's instrumentation of Weber's Invitation to the Waltz. Other numbers are the prelude to the third act of Massenet's "Heriodiade," vorspiel to "Parsifal," and Tschaikowsky's descriptive overture "1812." At the Wednesday "Pop" Mrs. Fisk and Nahan Franko will be the soloists. Wednesday night the entire organization will play at the Macdonough in Oakland with Nordica as soloist. The box office is at Sherman, Clay & Co.'s where complete programs for the four concerts may be obtained.

The great demand for seats for the concerts to be given Tuesday and Thursday nights and Wednesday and Friday afternoons at the Alhambra theatre, by Duss, the Metropolitan Opera House Orchestra, Madame Nordica, Mrs. Katharine Fisk and Mr. Nahan Franko, augurs well for the success of the venture. Equally favorable reports have been received from Sacramento and Oakland.

Dr. Alex. J. McIvor-Tyndall has the happy faculty of uniting a fascinating , mysterious, and exciting entertainment with instructive and practical lectures along psychological lines, and there are enough people in San Francisco who like instruction with their entertainment to fill Steinway hall every Sunday evening. Last Sunday evening there was the customary large audience, the subject for discussion being "Money: the psychic law governing it." The lecture was practical rather than metaphysical, and contained some valuable suggestions for the business man. The demonstration was even more than usually interesting, the election (psychically) of the next Mayor causing much merriment. Tomorrow night Tyndall will talk on "The World Invisible, with experiments and manifestations illustrative of his subject. The subject for the following Sunday evening will be "Spiritualism."

John Morrisey, resident manager of the Orpheum, accompanied by Mrs. Morrisey, left Tuesday morning for a brief sojourn in the southern part of the State. They will spend a few days at Santa Barbara, Los Angeles, Catalina Island and other places of interest.

Carl Reinecke, the celebrated composer, has dedicated his latest composition to Sir Henry Heyman of this city. It is a Romanze for piano and violin and a work of rare beauty. Sir Henry is an intimate friend of the composer, who was for years director of the Gewandhaus concerts in Leipsic. Reinecke is now seventy-eight years of age.

The Great Chariot Race

The coming of "Ben-Hur" to San Francisco is looked forward to with keen interest. Klaw & Erlanger's production of General Lew Wallace's popular masterpiece will be seen at the Grand Opera House on Monday evening, November second, and will continue for four weeks with matinees on Wednesday and Saturday of each week. The production is noted for its dramatic excellence, its sumptuous mounting, and its faithful representations of scenes and costumes of a most picturesque period, but paramount to these is the interest centred in the realistic chariot race in the fifth act, for which a staff of expert mechanics have prepared the stage of the Grand. This is considered the most effective reality ever seen in a theatre either in this country or abroad. Its development into an actuality may be considered the triumph of stagecraft. In this incident sixteen horses and two chariots will be shown apparently racing at break-neck speed, the animals galloping with all their power. Four horses, the two blacks and the two whites, are driven by Messala, and the Arabian bays by Ben-Hur. Messala leads. Ben-Hur smashes the wheels of Messala's chariot; the Roman falls beneath the feet of the crazed horses and Ben-Hur wins the race. The advance sale of seats begins Thursday, October twenty-ninth at 9 a. m.

McCarthy's Latest

Justin Huntley McCarthy's new play, "The Proud Princess," which shocked Detroit where it was tried on the dog, has reached New York, and Acton Davies says that though the harem scene had been pruned and expurgated, there is enough left to show that Detroit had reason to be shocked. He characterizes the play as mediocre melodrama with a dash of "Everyman" on the side.

Next Thursday evening will be given Madame Fabbri's second subscription performance at Golden Gate hall. "Her Only Fault," a one-act farce, a Spanish song and dance, a German comedy, a Japanese song and dance and the farce "A Husband in Clover" will be given.

On the heels of Helen Bertram's marriage with E. J. Morgan comes the report that her erstwhile lover, S. George D'Essauer, is petitioning for a pardon from Joliet penitentiary.

Getting Ready for Light Opera

The new Tivoli is rapidly approaching completion, and lovers of light opera are getting on the tip-toe of expectation. Meanwhile the management is rounding up talent for the company with which the new house is to be opened. Though there will be many familiar faces in the new company there will also be some new ones. Among the latter will be that of Wallace Brownlow, the English baritone now at the Orpheum, who has had a great deal of experience in comic opera both in London and in the Antipodes. It is to be hoped that the new Tivoli will be strictly up to date, and that its patrons will be accorded the privilege of hearing some of the latest musical successes. Some of us should be glad enough to hear even a few comparatively old ones that have been shelved in the East after long runs but that have not been produced on this coast.

Mansfield Was Polite

Mr. Richard Mansfield opened the new Lyric theatre in New York last week in an artistic production of "Old Heidelberg," the same play in which young Boucicault enhanced his histrionic reputation last season. At the end of the play Mr. Mansfield made a polite speech, an innovation which no doubt disappointed many of the audience. Mr. Mansfield must have been very well pleased with himself, with the play and with the new theatre.

Miss Millicent Levenburg has returned to New York and will have her classes in gymnastics as usual this winter. Miss Levenburg's classes are quite the thing among the smart young women of Gotham who go in for athletics. Some of them have become expert boxers.

The Dewey theatre of Oakland has been added to the Sair & Havelin circuit, and tomorrow night those managers will present at that house a melodrama entitled "Over Niagara Falls."

Fischer's has secured a successful burlesque of last season, "Chow Chow," which will have an early production at this house.

Features of Next Week's Bills

"Under the Red Robe" will have a week at the Alcazar with "Too Much Johnson" to follow.

"Andre Chenier" will be continued at the Tivoli, to alternate with "Un Ballo Maschera." The casts will include all the favorites.

"Spotless Town" will be a big drawing card at the Grand.

The headliners at the Orpheum will be McWalters and Tyson. Their stage setting shows the interior of a dressing room, and they make up for their various roles in full view of the audience. Their number closes with a transformation scene in which the dressing room changes to a swamp, filled with giant lilies. Coleman's cats and dogs, direct from the Alhambra, London, the three Richards, acrobats, who were here six years ago, Crawford and Manning, black face team, and Wenona and Frank, who hold the world's championship for rifle and pistol shooting, will complete the novelties.

NAHAN FRANKO

The famous violinist and concert master of the New York Metropolitan Opera House orchestra, which opens at the Alhambra theatre Tuesday night.

Robert Edeson in "Soldiers of Fortune" will have another week at the Columbia and then will come "The Storks" direct from the Dearborn theatre, Chicago. In the company are the Countess von Hatzfeldt, and the much talked of "Rosebud Garden of Girls."

"The Paraders" is still crowding Fischer's, though "Rubes and Roses" is ready to clap on at any time when the public taste changes. A new soubrette and a new comedian have been added to the Fischer forces.

"Uncle Tom's Cabin" will probably crowd the Central, for the play is always a money-winner. There will be one hundred people in the cast, and fifty negroes in the cotton-picking scene. The specialties will embrace Southern plantation melodies, buck-and-wing dancing and cake-walks. Herschel Mayall will be George Harris; Eugenie Thais Lawton, Eliza; Ernest Howell, Uncle Tom; Myrtle Vane, Topsy; Henry Shumer, Simon Legree; Edwin T. Emery, St. Claire, and Messrs. Webster, Nicholls, Booth, Bacon, Whipple and Edwards, Margaret Leavy, Genevieve Kane, Anita Fallon, Grace Stoddard, and Lola Hinchliff will have acceptable parts. In the mounting seventeen sets of scenery will be used.

At the Chutes will be John World and Mindel Kingston, singing and dancing novelty artists, John Mathews and Emily Hoff, singers and instrumentalists, direct from New York, and Phoebe Gibson, a talented young violinist. —The Playgoer.

The Career of Mrs. Osborne

Some books demand entirely too much of the reader's credulity. One has to admit so much before getting foot on common ground with the author that it is like taking leave of one's sanity. "The Career of Mrs. Osborne" is one of that class. It is woven of the material which supplies the plots for farce comedies, the sort of thing that one sits through and laughs at, but once out in the free, fresh air, one feels ashamed of having appeared to enjoy. The Mrs. Osborne whom Helen Milcete has pictured for us is, according to her standard, a very clever woman—and an American domiciled in London. When she was Jane Egerton she was very poor and very much in love with a man as poor as herself. The orphan of a United States Senator, with the wife of the English Ambassador for her godmother, Jane was not made of the stuff that marries poverty, so they kissed and parted. In due course of time a cousin married wealth and the rich husband, dying conveniently, left Jane a legacy of a million in his will. Then Jane married an Englishman, George Wilton, impecunious and untitled, a captain in active service in the British army, and at the time the story begins, on duty in India, while his wife and sister-in-law are on a visit to the Wilton household. The Wiltons are rather tiresome people, it must be confessed, but they have a decent regard for the ten commandments and the conventions, all of which grate on the nerves of Mrs. George Wilton and Miss Sarah Egerton. The conjunction of two paragraphs in one of the society journals suggests a brilliant scheme to Mrs. Wilton and she proceeds to put it into working order. One bit of information is that her former lover, one Van Imden, who, like herself, has unexpectedly come in for a fortune, is in London, and the other is that there is no reigning Beauty in the smart set. Mrs. Wilton, being a beauty, resolves to apply for the vacancy, and at the same time, to re-capture her old lover, so she invents an excuse to go up to London, and "Mrs. Osborne" is born. The name is that of the widowed cousin whose husband left her the fortune. Forthwith a flat is engaged at Kensington and a maid installed, in order that the Wiltons may have an address for their letters and a place to be received when they come to town. "Mrs. Osborne," at the same time, takes a fashionable residence in a stylish locality and proceeds to enjoy herself after her kind. One might question how she so speedily reached the outer circles of royalty, and several other things, if it were worth while, but when one has to admit so much in the first place there is no use in balking at mere straws. However, she not only becomes, in less than a fortnight, the most admired and talked-of beauty in the social swim, but she has Van Imden stepping in her train, and whether he makes love to her or she to him it would be hard to say. Meanwhile life goes on at the flat, and it is life. It is set at such a rapid gait that the other tenants of the building take active measures to have the lady Jane and her sister ejected, though the author appears to think they were conducting themselves most admirably. Mrs. Wilton has a lively time trying to keep her identity with "Mrs. Osborne' a secret, and her midnight adventures in omnibuses and restaurants would do credit to a man of her years. Sarah Egerton is supposed to be the balance-wheel of the combination, and it is badly needed, but Sarah, with her demi-monde get-up, her visit to the music hall unescorted, and her nonchalant cigarette, for which she requests a light from her nearest neighbor, is no improvement on Jane, and it passes belief that only one solitary "blond gentleman" attempted to force his attentions upon her. But enough of all this. The plum in the pudding comes at the end. Mrs. Wilton finds discovery close on her heels and decides to put an end to things. She sees her Van Imden and puts a hypothetical case and gets some plain answers: "A woman like that would not expect me to marry her." "I have no fancy for shop-worn goods in women or anything else." He promptly tells her that he would

GEORGE H. BAHRS.

The nomination by the Republican party of ex-Judge George H. Bahrs, for Assessor, was a tribute to that gentleman's popularity. Judge Bahrs has demonstrated his capacity as a vote-getter, and he has made it apparent that there are many thousands of people in this city who have confidence in his integrity and ability. During his career on the Superior Bench he showed that he possessed a judicial mind as well as many of the qualities that are essential to the proper administration of the office of Assessor. He is making a very lively and aggressive campaign, and his speeches are very impressive.

WILLIAM BRODERICK

The Democratic candidate for Auditor, is well known to the people of this city. He has had a great deal of experience in the office, and he is regarded as the most efficient Watch-dog of the Treasury that this city ever had. In view of his past services he should be elected. During the next two years the office of Auditor will be the most important in the city government, and the tax-payers of the city should hope to see it in charge of a man of the character of William Broderick.

HENRY H. LYNCH.

The Republican candidate for Sheriff, is a man with an established reputation for executive ability. He is an ideal man for the office of Sheriff, and if elected he will undoubtedly administer the affairs of the office fearlessly and honestly.

not be dragged through the mire and muck of a divorce court for any woman, and all her beautiful air castles fall in a heap. Evidently the author imagines that the English laws are as lenient as those of America and as liberally interpreted in favor of dissatisfied women, while the idea of a husband being consulted when his wife decides to get rid of him is the last thing that occurs to her. However, the virtuous Sarah has telegraphed to the absent George, and he gets a leave of absence which brings him home at the psychological moment. Of course, he takes it all as a matter of course, and Jane falls in love with him, and we are expected to believe that a woman could deliberately plan such a career and carry it out, and come through it with no more moral deterioration than a child gets after a summer day ramble. And the last statement in the book is the final damnation of the inadequate Van Imden. "All the time he was making up to Jane he was living with some one else." Think of the perfidy of the man! That Jane was married to some one else all the time she was making up to him—well, little things like that don't matter apparently. As far as the book has any moral it is of the worst. Nevertheless, no one need be surprised if the thing is dressed up for the stage. Another of the Smart Set publications.

"Widows, Grave and Otherwise"

This is a companion to the volume of "Bachelor Bigotries." There is a selection for every day in the year, and if on the whole, the sentiments are less striking than those in the previous volume, it is only in comparison that they suffer. Taken by itself the book is all that any one could demand. Like the "Bachelor Bigotries," the quotations are culled from every source, and we find classical and Scriptural sentiments cheek by jowl with something from the last comic paper. Says Robert Louis Stevenson: "Once you are married there is nothing left for you, not even suicide, but to be good."

And Benjamin Franklin: "One good husband is worth two good wives, for the scarcer things are the more they are valued."

Dorothy Dix adds: "Get a wife who has learned how to keep house on your predecessor, and is in no danger of giving you dyspepsia while she experiments with cooking school recipes."

Josiah Allen's Wife assures us that: "She was a good-lookin' woman and had seen trouble. It stands to reason she had, with four husbands. Good land!"

There is a proverb to the effect that one should "Never marry a widow unless her first husband was hanged," and another from the Spanish tells us that "He who marries a widow with three children marries four thieves." A Dutch epigram has it:—

"Said Jan, twice wedded to a scolding wife,
'Church-going is the greatest pleasure of my life;
'Tis strange and sweet to see a man, oh, rare!
Keep full five hundred women quiet there.'"

But this is enough to show the style of the text. As to the rest, it is from the Paul Elder Company's press, and there is no more to be said. Illustrations in black and scarlet are by A. F. Wilmarth and are neat and appropriate. The volume, which is listed at $1 net, will make an appropriate Christmas gift, being just as useful, far more interesting and decidedly more novel than the conventional calendar.

WASHINGTON DODGE.

Dr. Washington Dodge, the Democratic candidate for Assessor, has proved himself a faithful official. He has equalized the assessment roll of this city, and has assessed a great deal of personal property that had previously escaped taxation.

Clubjoy—Give me the effervescent actress every time—one with the sparkling champagne temperament.

Automobile Topics

With quite a bit of interest have local automobilists watched the progress of the motor cars in the great Eastern Endurance and Reliability run. Up to date nothing definite has been heard regarding the official report of the great competition. Two telegrams, one to the White Sewing Machine Company and the other to the National Automobile Company, have given the enthusiasts some knowledge of the possible winners. The one directed to the White company, dated October seventeenth, at Cleveland, Ohio, reads: "The White Touring Cars made best average performance of any make in New York, Cleveland and Pittsburg endurance contest, also best record English Reliability Trials. Details impossible until official report of contest out."

From the Knox Automobile Company, dated October sixteenth, Springfield, Mass.: "Model C. Car arrived in Pittsburg two o'clock yesterday. Roads almost impassable."

From the Pope Motor Car Company, dated October sixteenth, Toledo, Ohio: "Toledo car arrived Pittsburg leading all of the thirty-four contestants, having lost but eight points or eight minutes since leaving New York. Nearest competitor about seventy-five points behind. Others to hear from. This remarkabble rec-five points behind. Others to hear from. This remarkable rec-of the world."

Evidently the rush for automobiles will continue all through the winter season in the East. The factories are running at full capacity and are still behind. Especially is this so with the Olds Motor Works, which is very much behind. The Pioneer Automobile Company here reports sixteen on their waiting list for Oldsmobiles

Dr. F. H. Bangs of San Jose has just returned from a tour through Humboldt county in his Stevens-Duryea and reports a very pleasant trip.

It was reported last week, in one of the Stockton papers, that Mr. W. J. Hansel of Stockton was arrested for fast driving in his Stevens-Duryea and that he was going at the rate of one hundred miles an hour. This report is not credited by the Pioneer Automobile Company, the Pacific coast agents for the machine.

Mr. H. L. Ricks, an enthusiastic owner of a "White" touring car, was in San Francisco last Sunday. He intends to return for the races. Mr. Ricks is a resident of Eureka and reports some long trips through the Humboldt redwoods in his car.

Mr. David Scouler is one of the latest purchasers of "White" touring cars. He is a resident of New Zealand and expects to take his car to that place.

Mr. M. German, who with his wife journeyed all the way from San Diego to this city in a Knox automobile, will return in his horseless carriage.

The National Automobile Company will be right in line for the November race meeting. They will have several speedy rigs in which to compete.

Miss Bertha M. Dolbeer made a trip last week in her Packard through the northern counties. The ride was a very successful one.

On Sunday, October eighteenth, Cuyler Lee and D. O. MacNabb made a trip from the Hotel Del Monte to Twelfth and Broadway, Oakland, in five hours and thirty-eight minutes.

Walter Grothe, H. O. Ryus and Frank A. Garbutt will all race in "White" automobiles in next month's race meet. Word was received the other day from Garbutt that he would be on hand.

MUSIC

[Communications addressed to this department should be received not later than Wednesday noon.]

A Talented Girl

Carrie Sheuerman, Hugo Mansfeldt's young pupil, proved a surprise of the right kind. The young girl—she is not fifteen—showed that she is not only possessed of power and technique, but of what is more vital—temperament and imagination. Her program was divided between two modern masters, Grieg and Tschaikowsky, and at least half of her selections were new to a San Francisco audience. Grieg may be termed a painter in music, indeed it has been said that a trip through his music is like a tour through Norway. It requires some poetry of soul to interpret his sudden changes of mood and bold and daring harmonies. The right atmosphere was not lacking from Miss Sheuerman's readings. I enjoyed all her Grieg numbers, but admired most perhaps the Holberg Suite, of whose difficulties she made light work. The Tschaikowsky numbers occupied the second part of the program. In these the young girl was equally at home. The Nocturne (op. 30 No. 1) was ear-caressing in its tenderness. Miss Sheuerman expresses a preference for the Russian composer, whose Oriental color she seems to comprehend instinctively. It is a platitude that musical genius and talent ripen early, otherwise it would be incredible that so young a girl could achieve such breadth and maturity of expression. Miss Sheuerman is the embodiment of physical health and vitality, and it is to be hoped that she will continue to advance in the career which she has so auspiciously begun.

Schlott Plays at the Hopkins

Never has a finer program been given at a Hopkins musicale than that on Wednesday evening, when the members of the Bankers' Association who are holding their convention this week were the guests of honor. Henry Heyman had increased his orchestra for the occasion and it was heard in the Mary Frances Searles gallery in a program comprising selections by Wagner, Ole Bull (a melody harmonized for strings only by Svendsen), Gounod, Strauss, Gilmore, Ponchielli, Bizet, Schubert, Titl and Hauschild. The Titl number was a serenade with horn solo and flute obligato. Ernst Schlott rendered the horn solo, and it was a marvelous thing, and worth going many miles to hear. Schlott is one of the great horn players of the world, yet he elects to remain in San Francisco and fill a modest position in a theatrical orchestra, because he likes the place and the people here suit him. He could win fame abroad if he wished. His appearance at this Hopkins musicale was an artistic treat. While the orchestra concertized in the Searles gallery, in the "House" gallery there was another program rendered, the participants being the Knickerbocker male quartet, Homer Henley, Mrs. Grace Davis Northrup, Mrs. Lena Carroll Nicholson and Otto Fleissner, organist and accompanist. Tonight, which sees the close of the Photographic Salon, there will be a musicale in which will appear Miss Annabelle Levy, soprano, Miss Josephine Parker, violinist, Miss Mabel Hill, accompanist for Miss Parker, Hubert Clyde Linscott, tenor, and Otto Fleissner, organist.

Music in Oakland

Two hundred and fifty of the best vocalists in Oakland, Alameda and Berkeley have formed an organization and have been rehearsing in the auditorium of the Young Men's Christian Association for the past six weeks, and are planning to give two concerts in the Macdonough theatre Tuesday and Wednesday evenings, November tenth and eleventh. The object of these concerts is to provide special funds to be devoted to the furnishings of the new auditorium contemplated in the new building of the Association at the corner of Fourteenth and Jefferson streets. The rehearsals which are taking place from week to week would indicate that the chorus will be the best ever gathered on the coast. The singers read at sight and their voices have been well trained. It is seldom that trained voices are willing to do work of this kind but the object has brought such an organization together and those who will hear them will appreciate their work. All the singers are giving their time and this includes the leaders, Messrs. Crandall, Hughes, Dow and Stewart. The latter gentlemen have been present at every rehearsal and have done much to arouse enthusiasm among the members of the chorus. An orchestra of thirty-five pieces will accompany the chorus and will also give several selections. The orchestra will be the best that can be secured around the bay and every effort is being made to secure a special soloist for each evening.

Art Association Concert in Berkeley

Hearst hall, Berkeley, was crowded on Wednesday evening, when the first of the Art Association series of concerts was given under the direction of C. Ernest Edwards. The program was generously encored by the audience, which manifested great interest throughout the evening. Those taking part were Mr. Edward W. Tillson, pianist, Mrs. Grace Davis Northrup, soprano, Mrs. Grace Carroll Elliott, contralto, and Mr. Hother Wismer, violinist. Mr. Wismer's playing of Sinding's Presto and Adagio movements was exceptionally fine and received vigorous applause. Mr. Tillson, who is a recent arrival from New York, did all the accompanying of the evening and rendered two solos. Mendelssohn's Prelude and Fugue, op. 35 No. 1, was excellently played, showing clean-cut execution and understanding. The audience became quite enthusiastic over this number. Mrs. Northrup's group of songs contained a new composition, "Each Hour You Are Away," which was dedicated to her by the composer, John W. Metcalf. It is not yet published and was rendered from the manuscript, but promises to prove a catchy number when offered in the music stores. Mrs. Northrup is a soprano whose work is marked by steady improvement. Mrs. Elliott's singing of the "Fairy Love Song" by Willeby was particularly pleasing; an English song was substituted for Hartmann's "Schwanenlied" which was programmed.

Adelina Patti will arrive in America direct from Craig-I-Nos in November and begin her tour at the New Maryland theatre in Baltimore. She brings forty people, all artists of high standing. Manager Friedlander will shortly announce the particulars of the concerts to be given in this city. Those who heard her in the old days are recounting stories of her early appearances. Among those her London debut was perhaps the most momentous. At that time Mapleson was manager of Her Majesty's, one of the two grand opera houses of London. He positively refused to have anything to do with a girl who had nothing but an American reputation behind her. Gye, the manager of Covent Garden, promised to give her one appearance and to decide afterwards what she should be paid. Adelina made her first appearance as Amina in "La Somnambula." So well did she please the staid old Londoners that Gye was glad to retain her, and it was in this way that Covent Garden became her London home for so long.

On Tuesday evening a recital was given in the Alameda Unitarian church by piano pupils of Miss Elizabeth Westgate and violin pupils of Alexander T. Stewart, assisted by Miss Eugenia Burbank, soprano, pupil of E. D. Crandall, and by Messrs. Margaret Davis, Aimee Davies, Winifred Warner and Ruth Bruce, accompanists. The program was an interesting one, and the participants were Isabel Meyer, Clay N. Burrell, Fern Frost, Mary Van Orden, Gertrude Hibberd, Mina Clarke, Fannie Lawton, Sydney Miller, Marion Speddy, Mary Sherwood, Ethel Amann, Helen Sutphen, Winnie Bruce, Grace Marshall, Lillie Chrestoffersen, Isabel Seal, Harriet Huggins, Cornelia Loring, Charles H. Blank, Vere Hunter, Ray Rugg, Edwin Duval, Fred Seifert, M. Lytjen and John Poston.

Music in Alameda has received considerable impetus through the good work done by the musical critic of Tidings, which is the organ of Alameda's clubwomen. All the musical events in San Francisco, Oakland and Alameda are recorded in Tidings.

The sixth operatic costume recital of Professor Joseph Greven's pupils will take place in Native Sons' hall on November sixth. Mrs. Lenore Greven recently sang at a concert given by Salesian Council, Y. M. I., and made a great hit in Arditi's "Il Bacio" and the "Ernani" aria. —The Music Critic.

A NEW LAW

The Board of Commissioners in Optometry according to a new law enacted by the last Legislature, has issued a Certificate to Mr. George Mayerle, the German Expert Optician at 1071 Market Street, authorizing him to practice Optometry and prescribe glasses to those having weak eyes and poor sight. Mr. George Mayerle has probably prescribed glasses to more prominent men of the world than any other optician in this country. The fact that the highest U. S. Army, Navy and Government officials and most eminent clergymen, judges and educators of California are using his glasses should be sufficient evidence of his wonderful ability to treat most complicated cases with accuracy and absolute perfection.

Commander U. S. Navy. MARE ISLAND, CAL., July 20, 1903. MR. GEORGE MAYERLE—Dear Sir: The eyeglasses you made for me are the most satisfactory pair I have had in the last thirty years. Check in payment is enclosed herewith. Very respectfully, W. W. KIMBALL, Commander U. S. Navy.

The President of Santa Clara College. MR. GEORGE MAYERLE—Dear Sir: The glasses ordered came in good time. They are excellent and I am more than pleased with them. Yours very truly, ROBERT E. KENNA, S. J.

Office Chief of Police. It gives me much pleasure to recommend to the public, Mr. George Mayerle, of San Francisco. I have been using glasses for the past four years, and during that time have consulted several opticians, but not until I had consulted Mr George Mayerle and had him fit glasses to my eyes did I get entire satisfaction. Respectfully, J. H. ANDERSON, Sergeant of Police.

Admiral Dewey, who used George Mayerle's glasses during the Spanish-American war, and is still using them with much satisfaction, highly recommends Mr. George Mayerle, and sends the following testimonial: MR. GEORGE MAYERLE—My Dear Sir: I am still using with much satisfaction the glasses you sent me at Manila; also the new ones suit my eyes perfectly. Yours very truly, GEORGE DEWEY.

Other People's Ideas

From "The Little Minister," by J. M. Barrie:

The praise that comes of love does not make us vain, but humble rather.

"Can a man like a woman against his will?" Gavin blurted out. "Of course he can," said the Egyptian, speaking as one who knew. "That is the very nicest way to be liked."

We should be slower to think that the man at his worst is the real man, and certain that the better we are ourselves the less likely is he to be at his worst in our company. Every time he talks away his character before us he is signifying contempt for ours.

I never see a respectable man not smoking, sir, but I feel indignant with him for such sheer waste of time.—Dr. McQueen.

Oh, if I were a man I would wish to be everything I am not, and nothing that I am. I would scorn to be a liar, I would choose to be open in all things, I would try to fight the world honestly. But I am only a woman, and so—" (Babbie).

Love, it is said, is blind, but love is not blind. It is an extra eye, which shows us what is most worthy of regard. To see the best is to see most clearly, and it is the lover's privilege.

No man can stand long on nothing,—he must think out a religion or accept a theology.—Elizabeth Stuart Phelps.

From Lorrimer's "Letters of a Self-Made Merchant":

With most men duty means something unpleasant which the other fellow ought to do. As a matter of fact a man's first duty is to mind his own business. It's been my experience that it takes about all the thought and work one man can give to run one man right, and if a fellow's putting in five or six hours a day on his neighbor's character he's mighty apt to scamp the building of his own.

It isn't enough to be all right in this world; you've got to look all right as well, because two-thirds of success is making people think you are all right. So you have to be governed by general rules, even if you are an exception.

If there's anything worse than knowing too little it's knowing too much. Education will broaden a narrow mind, but there's no cure for big head. The best you can hope for is that it will swell up and bust—and then, of course, there's nothing left. Poverty never spoils a good man but prosperity often does. It's easy to stand hard times because that's the only thing you can do, but in good times the fool-killer has to do night work. —The Gleaner.

Action brought in the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and the Complaint filed in the office of the Clerk of said City and County of San Francisco.

The People of the State of California send Greeting to:

A. C. Freese (Administrator of the Estate of Pierre Langaron (deceased), Eleanora O Salmon, Eleanora O. Salmon (as Trustee) Louise Emile Salmon, Francis Salmon, Alfred Salmon, Eleanora Alexandrina Salmon, Joseph Reavilo, also known as Jose Raviolo, otherwise known as Jose Raviola, Jean Marcellin Pourguery, Tomas Pidello, Guillaume Pache, Jean Pache, Gaspard Sadony, Eleanora O Salmon (Executrix of the Last Will of Francis Salmon, deceased) John Doe, Richard Roe James Black, Mary Green and Mary Doe, also all other persons unknown, claiming any right, title, estate, lien or interest in the real property described in the complaint adverse to Plaintiff's ownership, or any cloud upon Plaintiff's title thereto

YOU ARE HEREBY DIRECTED to appear and answer in an action entitled as above, brought against you in the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, within ten days after the service on you of this Summons—if served within this County; or within thirty days if served elsewhere.

And you are hereby notified that, unless you appear and answer as above required, the said Plaintiff will take judgment for any money or damages demanded in the complaint as arising upon contract or he will apply to the Court for any other relief demanded in this complaint.

That the property involved in and affected by said action is described as follows, to wit:

All that certain lot, piece or parcel of land, situate, lying and being in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, commencing at a point where the Northerly line of Union street intersects the Easterly line of Dupont street; thence running Easterly along said line of Union street Twenty-three (23) feet; thence at right angles Northerly Thirty-four (34) feet and four and one-half (4½) inches thence at right angles Westerly Twenty-three (23) feet to the said Easterly line of Dupont street, and thence Southerly and along said line of Dupont street Thirty four (34) feet and four and one half (4½) inches to the point of commencement.

That the object of said action is to obtain a judgment and decree of the above entitled Court adjudging and determining that the above named defendants and all other persons claiming any right, title, estate, lien or interest in the real property described in the plaintiff's complaint adverse to plaintiff's ownership or any cloud upon plaintiff's title thereto have not, and that none of them has any estate, right, title, lien or interest whatever in or to said real property, or in or to any part or parcel thereof, and that the title of plaintiff is good and valid, and that said defendants and all of said persons unknown as aforesaid be forever enjoined and debarred from asserting any claim whatever in or to said real property, or in or to any part or parcel thereof adverse to the plaintiff, and for such other, further and additional relief as to the Court may seem meet and proper in the premises, and for costs of suit.

Action brought in the Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and the Complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said Superior Court.

The People of the State of California send Greeting to:

EMMA C. COATES, Defendant.

YOU ARE HEREBY REQUIRED to appear in an action brought against you by the above-named Plaintiff in the Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and to answer the Complaint filed therein within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this Summons, if served within this County; or if served elsewhere, within thirty days.

The said action is brought to obtain a judgment and decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony now existing between plaintiff and defendant, upon the ground of defendant's willful desertion of said plaintiff for more than one year prior to the commencement of this action and upon the ground of defendant's extreme cruelty to plaintiff as appears from the complaint on file herein to which special reference is hereby made: also for general relief, as will more fully appear in the Complaint on file, to which special reference is hereby made.

All of which will more fully appear in the Complaint on file herein to which you are hereby referred.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said Complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief therein demanded.

In the Matter of the Estate of LAWRENCE FELVEY, Deceased

CATHERINE FELVEY, administratrix of the estate of Lawrence Felvey, deceased, having filed her petition herein praying for an order to sell real estate of said decedent for purposes therein set forth,

IT IS THEREFORE ORDERED by the said Court that all persons interested in the estate of said deceased, appear before the said Superior Court, on Wednesday, the 4th day of November, 1903, at 10 o'clock A. M., of said day at Court room of said Superior Court at the City Hall in said City and County to show cause why an order should not be granted to the said administratrix to sell so much of the real estate of the said deceased, at either private sale or public auction as shall be necessary and that a copy of this order be published at least four successive weeks in Town Talk, a newspaper printed and published in said City and County.

Dated, October 5, 1903 J. V. COFFEY, Judge.

ADELAIDE C. SHADE, Plaintiff vs. WILLIAM F. SHADE, Defendant

Action brought in the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and the Complaint filed in the office of the Clerk of said City and County of San Francisco.

The People of the State of California send Greeting to:

WILLIAM F. SHADE, Defendant.

YOU ARE HEREBY DIRECTED to appear and answer the complaint in an action entitled as above, brought against you in the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, within ten days after the service on you of this Summons—if served within this County; or within thirty days if served elsewhere.

And you are hereby notified that, unless you appear and answer as above required the said Plaintiff will take judgment for any money or damages demanded in the complaint, as arising upon contract or will apply to the Court for any other relief demanded in the complaint.

[SEAL] GIVEN under my hand and the Seal of the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco State of California this 4th day of September, A. D., 1903.

CLIFFORD E. LINTON, Plaintiff vs. ADDIE LINTON, Defendant

Action brought in the Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and the Complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said Superior Court.

The People of the State of California send Greeting to:

ADDIE LINTON, Defendant.

YOU ARE HEREBY REQUIRED to appear in an action brought against you by the above-named Plaintiff in the Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and to answer the Complaint filed therein within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this Summons, if served within this County; or if served elsewhere, within thirty days.

The said action is brought to obtain a judgment and decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony now existing between plaintiff and defendant, upon the ground of defendant's desertion of plaintiff; also for general relief, as will more fully appear in the Complaint on file, to which special reference is hereby made.

All of which will more fully appear in the Complaint on file herein to which you are hereby referred.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said Complaint as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief therein demanded.

(SEAL) GIVEN under my hand and Seal of said Superior Court at the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, this 14th day of July, in the year of our Lord, one thousand nine hundred and three. ALBERT B. MAHONY, Clerk

Pro Honore

Where got you that rose, my daughter Annie;
Where got you that rose, tell me?
"In a garden it grew,
With thyme and with rue,
And my lover he gave it to serve his plea,
My lover so bold and free."

Where got you that look in your face, Annie,
In your face so white of blee?
"I hastened and ran
A league and a span,
From a ghost who followed close, close upon me,—
A most fearsome ghost to see."

Where got you that blood on your hands, Annie;
Where got you that stain grisly?
"My love offered wrong,
He was stour and strong,—
But I stabbed him thrice for mine honour and thee,
I stabbed him to death, woe's me!"

Some Risque Witticisms

The editors of the Pelican, a comic paper published at the University of California, have succeeded in shocking the co-eds of the institution. Indeed, they have startled the faculty by the boldness of their humor, and there is talk of appointing a censor, for some of the jokes in a recent issue are considered decidedly risque. That they are a trifle spicy there is no doubt, but then the Pelican is not a religious publication. The paper has the approval of President Wheeler, who says that it contains material superior to much that appears in the San Francisco newspapers. He explains that as it is a humorous magazine it should not be taken seriously. Here is one of the jokes that is susceptible of more than one interpretation:

"This is your beginning," she sighed, breathing with difficulty.
"Big inning," he said, and raised the remaining arm to turn the feeble gas jet.

Quite an innocent witticism, perhaps, but not if you analyze it. Scarcely the sort of intellectual diet that should be served to young co-eds.

Here is another, the author of which is probably in training for a job on one of the risque Parisian magazines:

The Professor—Willum, what is a virgin forest?
Bill (with no hesitation)—One what's never been axed.

These are in a milder vein:

"Doctor, what degree will I get if I group on child study?"
Doctor—MA, I suppose.

"I have hooked thee a ring,"
Said the cannibal king,
And the maiden all blushing replied:
"Oh, Bill, what a shame
Now 'tis summer again
Surplus clothing I must lay aside."

There was once a sculptor called Phidias
Whose statues were perfectly hideous
'Till he made Aphrodite
Without any nightie,
And we had to take something to stiddy us.

Lane's Conspicuous Unfitness

The Lane boomers of newspaperdom are opposed to the election of Henry J. Crocker to the office of Mayor, because he has had no opportunity to perfect himself in the science of municipal government. They have sought to prejudice people against him by misrepresentation, slander and ingenious prevarication, but their only serious and well-founded objection to him is that he has never been a tax-eater and that consequently his education has been neglected. It is this very unsophistication of Mr. Crocker that should commend him to the favorable consideration of intelligent voters. There is nothing cryptic about the science of municipal government. It is not founded upon abstruse principles. It involves no study of complex technicalities, and it presents no complicated problems to befuddle the man of ordinary intelligence. The best Mayors that San Francisco had were raw recruits from the ranks of private citizenship, untainted by the slime that clings to those who wallow in the mephitic pool of politics. Mr. James D. Phelan was one of them. During his first term he rendered brilliant service to the people, but after two years he became an accomplished politician and a demoralized public servant. In two years the apostle of reform was metamorphosed into an exponent of dexterous perfidy. Mr. Franklin K. Lane was a shining light in the political school of which James D. Phelan was the founder, a school in which has been avowed pernicious principles that were without the disguise of a palliating sophism, and that were assumed as the fundamental axioms of all political science. Mr. Franklin K. Lane is unquestionably an experienced tax-eater, but with all his experience in job-chasing and job-holding it does not appear that he derived any intellectual benefit therefrom. Experience, like education, is wasted on those who lack ability. Mr. Lane has a talent for stump-speaking, but he has given no evidence of other attainments. If he were a capable man in his profession he would not be continually chasing small political jobs. Capable lawyers achieve things in their professional capacity before entering the political arena. Mr. Lane has had no experience in his profession except through his political associations. As City Attorney he has had plenty of opportunity to practice his profession, but realizing his shortcomings he depended entirely on his office staff except in the Spring Valley Water case. He persuaded the Supervisors to appropriate twenty-five thousand dollars for special counsel in that case, and now he is very indignant because it was intimated that he would pocket some of that fee. A statement to that effect by A. P. Van Duzer was stigmatized by Lane as a lie. It is easy to denounce people as liars. It is usual for crooks to denounce their accusers as such. Town Talk knows nothing about the Van Duzer charge, but we do know that if Mr. Lane were an honest and conscientious official he would not have sanctioned the appropriation of twenty-five thousand dollars of the people's money to pay for work which it is his duty to perform. Moreover we do know that there are many lawyers in this city who would be quite willing to split up the fee with him. Indeed there are few who, if employed under the circumstances, would not feel that they were indebted to Mr. Lane. However, in view of Mr. Lane's record as City Attorney, it is perhaps fortunate that special counsel has been provided for in the Spring Valley water case. His record in that office has been one series of blunders. The most costly of them was the one which invalidated the bond issue, about which Mr. Lane has had nothing to say since the beginning of this campaign. Indeed Mr. Lane has cautiously refrained from discussing his official acts. He has not even sought to explain why the suit for the removal of the Mission tracks has been permitted to drag along for three years without the slightest effort at prosecution on the part of the city's legal department. The Examiner and Bulletin profess to be much concerned over the Mission tracks, and they fear that if Mr. Crocker be elected those tracks will not be removed. What assurance have they that, as Mayor, Mr. Lane would be more aggressive in his attitude towards the railroad company than he has been as City Attorney? They know that in the suit against the railroad he has been guilty of negligence so gross that it is unparalleled in the history of litigation in this city. Do they believe that his apathy in that matter is merely the result of a constitutional weakness? Is it to be accounted for as an oversight, or as the result of sublimated ignorance, as in the School Department case in which Mr. Lane astounded the Supreme Court by his failure to file a bond on appeal? Mr. Lane has done a great deal of talking in this campaign but he has touched on none of these matters of vital interest. He prefers to deal in glittering generalities about the peril of the city government, and his eminent fitness as a savior of the people's rights. The conceit of the man is both astonishing and disgusting. That he has not yet been jeered off a platform is amazing. Fancy a candidate for Mayor uttering such rot as this, and not being guyed off the stage: "If you want protection to your fair ones and your little ones, your schools and your homes, I appeal to you to vote for me." Could anything more eloquently proclaim the mountebank? Mr. Lane's habit of concentrating his thoughts upon himself is probably affecting his brain. It looks like a case of self-contemplation superinducing paresis. And yet we are told by his newspaper touts that he is mentally sound, and well balanced. We happen to know, however, that they don't mean what they say. Both the Bulletin and Examiner have proclaimed Lane an incompetent. That was before they deemed it expedient to support him in this campaign. That was their honest judgment of him. It would be discourteous to speculate as to their reasons for changing their views.

DENTIST—Phelan Bldg., Rooms 6, 8, 10, 48. 806 Market St. Phone John 3841

The Fight Against Crocker

In view of Mr. Lane's official record it were not uncharitable to assume him to be incompetent. And at the same time Mr. Crocker should be felicitated on not having a public record. He is known merely as a private citizen who has been engaged in various activities, and who has quite frequently demonstrated that he was possessed of civic pride. He has always taken a little interest in politics, as becomes a good citizen, and he has always been identified with an element in his party that was striving for good government. He was never engaged in proclaiming his virtues or his capacity from the stump, and nobody ever heard of his seeking nomination for office. Yet he was sought by the leaders of the Republican party and prevailed upon to become a candidate for Mayor. Surely he must be a man of parts. Public office is not thrust upon men who are lacking in intelligence and force of character. So far his newspaper opponents have not been able to rake up any very serious charges against him, though they have shown an inclination in this campaign to go as far as the Health Department will permit. Their main objection is that he isn't a political hack of the Lane type. The Examiner objects to him because of his genial nature. That highly moral journal blushed at the sight of Mr. Crocker handing a man a glass of beer. The Bulletin affects the fear that he has entered into entangling alliances with certain predatory politicians. The Bulletin had no such fear two years ago when it was backing Asa R. Wells, the choice of the same people, and incidentally the protege of Martin Kelly. But as the campaign draws to a close the Examiner and Bulletin are becoming desperate. So glaring and preposterous has been their exhibition of hypocrisy and inconsistency throughout the campaign that the prospect of their candidate's coming in third in the race is decidedly alarming. After the fight they have put up the defeat of Lane will be a hard blow, and perhaps when they come to think it over it will occur to them that their methods were not conducive to the best interests of their candidate.

Why He Should Be Chosen

Town Talk espoused the cause of Mr. Crocker in this campaign because we believe that the Chief Executive of this city should be a man of courage and independence, imbued with a desire to conduct the city government in the interest of the people, and in a manner calculated to reflect credit on himself and the community. Mr. Schmitz has proved himself unworthy of public confidence, and Mr. Lane has a past by which the presumption is warranted that he would be the tool of a man no better than Abe Ruef, and that like Phelan he would devote most of his time to perfecting a political machine for his own aggrandizement. With three such men as Crocker, Lane and Schmitz in the field it should not be difficult for a conscientious voter to make his choice. Mr. Crocker is not a scheming politician; he is not the tool of any man in this community, and his sole purpose in becoming a candidate for Mayor is to lend a hand in the development of this city, and to merit the approval of his fellow-citizens. Those are worthy objects to inspire any man, and the people of this city should be eager to encourage its public spirited men who, like Mr. Crocker, have time to devote to high civic duties, and who have no selfish motives to actuate them in the discharge thereof.

Grover's Boom

Though Grover Cleveland does not enjoy the admiration or the confidence of the leaders of the Democratic party, and though it is pretty well understood that his sympathies are with the great financial interests of the country, there is undoubtedly a warm and general public interest in the only living ex-President of the United States. He may stand no chance of being nominated by the Democratic party next year, but he must be reckoned with as a Presidential possibility. The politicians despise him, but there are many sane and intelligent people who regard him as the greatest living American. There are many honest and sincere Democrats who denounced him as a traitor, and there are others who praise him as a man devoted to principle and as an intense patriot. At present he appears to be more beloved by Republicans than by Democrats, though he continues to argue in favor of tariff revision. He was in Chicago last week, and he aroused great enthusiasm. According to the Inter-Ocean, every third man by whom he was greeted expressed the hope of having an opportunity to vote for him again. The Hon. Carter Harrison is reported to have decided to have a sore throat as long as Mr. Cleveland was in Chicago. The Home and Farm, an influential Springfield paper, took a ballot on the question "Who shall be the Democratic candidate for President?" Mr. Cleveland received twelve hundred and eighty-three votes more than Bryan, Johnson, Hearst and Hill combined. Yet if you follow the Examiner closely these days you will be likely to get the impression that the only Democrat who is being mentioned as a Presidential possibility is William R. Hearst.

The Hearst Boom

Undoubtedly Mr. Hearst is a factor in national politics, and unquestionably labor sentiment throughout the country is with him. His most earnest supporters are the labor papers in all the great cities, and the other papers ignore him because they desire to create the impression that he is not seriously considered. Under the circumstances it behooves Mr. Hearst to give his boom publicity in his own papers, and at the same time to refrain from discussing the prospects of the other ambitious patriots. With three big metropolitan papers boosting him he cannot be entirely overlooked; and in view of the conspiracy of all the other influential papers to kill him off by not mentioning him, why shouldn't he work his own presses and linotypes to the greater glory of himself? He knows the value of newspaperiety and it cannot be denied him. Even though nothing ever comes of his boom he will at least have the satisfaction of knowing that he occasioned some alarm among the big financial interests, and that he had the backing of a powerful element in the industrial world. Mr. Hearst is a newspaperman first, and a politician incidentally, and his political activity will at least emphasize his importance in the field of journalism. Perhaps after all that is the main purpose of his boom. If so, whatever happens, he cannot lose. So he need not worry himself. Booming himself for President is a pleasant diversion, and it helps his business, while at the same time there is always the possibility ahead of his receiving the nomination. At present Mr. Cleveland is his only formidable rival, but the followers of Bryan still call the Princeton sage a traitor and will have none of him. It remains to be seen whether the followers of the Nebraskan control the convention. Meanwhile, Mr. Cleveland's utterances are read with great interest by the American people, and Mr. Cleveland is being favorably considered in the South, and the South is not without influence in the Democratic councils.

Funston's Recommendation

A few weeks ago General MacArthur reported to the War Department that there had been a great many desertions from the army during the preceding year. His figures startled the officials of the War Department, and provoked speculation as to the causes. Nobody appeared to attach much importance to the circumstance that Uncle Sam's fighting men are required to work for meagre wages. But now comes General Funston with the recommendation that the wages of all enlisted men and non-commissioned officers be raised, and probably in view of the alarming number of desertions his suggestions will be heeded. We do a great deal of boasting about the superior intelligence of our army, and about our brave and manly soldiers, but apparently we do not consider them of much value. The average free-born American citizen would feel that he had been humiliated were he to accept the wages of a soldier, and the man who becomes a soldier in this country in times of peace is regarded with contempt by many people. If General Funston's suggestions were adopted there would be some incentive to men to enter upon a military career. And then the army would not be recruited mostly from the ranks of despondents, or be filled with men devoid of ambition, or merely intent on keeping body and soul together until a more congenial occupation presented itself. It is not enough to know that we treat our soldiers a little better than the soldiers of foreign countries are treated. We should treat them as men and inspire them with self-respect.

The Protest Against Capital Punishment

The sickly sentimentalists are mourning over the "judicial murder" of three brothers executed in New York for the assassination of their uncle. The young scamps are referred to as "boys" and "lads," and one would suppose, from the tenor of some of the newspaper articles, that they were mere children whose prank had a more serious ending than they contemplated. The "lads" were grown men, the eldest twenty-seven and the youngest over twenty-one, and they, with a cousin who saved his neck by turning State's evidence, set out from their home and drove several miles with the deliberate intention of murdering the old man and robbing the house. They had been desperadoes for years, and their neighbors drew a breath of relief when they were finally rendered incapable of doing further harm. There is all the usual silly talk of want of proper bringing up, emancipation from parental control, and all the stock phrases which make up the sermons in such cases are heard, but there is no escape from the plain, indisputable fact that the culprits were of the criminal temperament. If they had been imprisoned instead of electrocuted, in the course of a few years they would have been liberated to resume their lawless operations. Eventually they would each have committed other crimes, and in all likelihood some of them would have adorned the limb of a tree or a convenient telegraph pole when endurance had reached its limit. It was a question of sooner or later. Was it better to have the "judicial murder" committed by the proper officials, decently and in order, or to have a mob collected, a jail stormed, and in all probability better lives sacrificed? With all the delays, technicalities and precautions invoked to save the necks of desperadoes from the noose in these days, there is precious little room left for doubt of deserts when occasionally some criminal meets his doom. If these three Van Wormers had not grown up with contempt for the authority of the law fostered by their experience and observation of the ease with which punishment is evaded, they might have stopped short in their career. To have let them off with a reprimand would have been to offer a premium to others to follow their example. In London, where crime is followed by punishment close upon the heels of its commitment, there is an average of two murders a year. In the United States, where everything is made as easy as possible to those who can pay for it, we have upward of ten thousand murders every year, and long before the cases come to trial all but those immediately interested have forgotten all about them, despite the diligence of yellow journalism in spreading all the facts, real, alleged or surmised, before a gaping public. Only last week a man died in the Oakland jail after waiting eighteen years for a trial. Instead of making any hue and cry over the electrocution of the Van Wormer "boys," the press of the country should unite to laud the New York authorities for a good thing well done.

Life's Mirage

Within my bruised heart the night of life
Let down the sombre curtain of the past
  Dull-leaded with despair:
Within the gray and ambient gloom
  Sat sullen sorrow:
The blackest hour had come when, lo, a light
Illumined all the barren, arid waste
  And Hope stood trembling there.
I dared not trust; I dared not lift my head;
In awe, I whispered, "What art thou?"
  .....She said
"I am the everlasting dawn
  Of life's tomorrow."

What's the Use?

BY HARRY COWELL

Nothing was ever worth doing except the impossible, and that, since science has learned how to do it every day, no longer has any charm. To do nothing is nowadays the only thing worth doing well. No one does that. To be a nobody is to be somebody. What's the use of sinning? Every one sins. No man, except one who is willing to do as all the world does, will take the trouble to commit adultery. What the devil the Devil's been up to lately is more than I can make out. Talk of original sin. I haven't heard of an original sin for ages. What a benefactor of good society would he be who should invent a new naughtiness! The Devil has disappeared from modern life, and the loss is irreparable. The times are tame because of unbelief.

Does any reader—of the fair sex or of the foul—wish to be distinguished? Alas, it is all too easy. Don't write a book; have a temperament other than the artistic; remain faithful to your wife or husband; believe in God. Once upon a time a woman might have endangered her soul for your sake; now she can't; she hasn't any. Once for one sweet hour of heaven on earth with you, she could have dared an eternity of hell. Nevermore can fear of everlasting fire give flavor to love. The day is degenerate. Romance is dead. Science alone survives. What is now the use of making unlawful love? There is no hell.

Would-be Don Juans labor under the delusion that French dinners a deux are good for the digestion and bad for the morals and therefore altogether delectable. On more than one tomorrow they wake up to the discovery that, although the dinner lies heavy on the stomach, the—well, the after-dinner does not lie heavy on the conscience; and for the life of them they cannot pleasure themselves with the proud sense of having sinned. What's the good of French dinners a deux? Your choice sinner never descends to deeds. Action, as Amiel has it, is vulgarized imagination.

Duty I aforetime thought the most detestable word in the English language. When the thing came in at my door, I flung open my window and delight went out thereat, and I would gladly have gone with it but for an æsthetic distaste for such a death. Now that no one does it, I can at least bring myself to speak the wretch's name.

Many years ago a friend of mine, in a spirit of finest self-sacrifice, married a woman of exquisite beauty, and made a green-eyed monster of himself, in the hope that I might find a dare-devil joy in kissing her. He thought he had done a rare thing and a romantic. I refrained from kissing her and thought I had done a rare thing and a romantic. Finally each made confession to the other. Now he knows, as I do, that for a husband to find joy in kissing his own wife is a rarer thing and much more romantic. He (my friend) and she (the woman of exquisite beauty) are to this day every whit as happy together as they could possibly be were he the husband of another woman and she the wife of another man.

Long since—I was very young then—I adored a woman. Adonis himself, as it seems to me—yes, I was very young—would have been altogether unworthy of her. Imagine my disenchantment when, after one short winter day's wooing, she accepted—me! Man's vanity invented woman's virtue. Men are often accused of thinking more of women while they are being wooed than after they have been won. Well, is not the average man amply justified in thinking less of a woman because of the mere fact that she is willing to marry him?

What's the use of wooing at all? It is impossibly commonplace. Youth fancies that this thing that has befallen it is new and strange and of a beauty until now unknown—the eighth wonder of the world; or at least flatters itself that it can add to love's language; but age knows that fully ninety-nine per cent of its love-making is merely imitation; that its quick words are but quotations from dead poets; that living lovers, or lovers that have long been dust, are singing or have sung the self-same rapturous songs, are saying or have said the same sweet nothings.

What's the use? Over the sun, back of the beyond, may be something new, but here under the sun—nothing! However original soever the life of a man may be, most of it (so says Science) is of necessity imitation. To repeat—of what earthly use is that?

But if science disenchants us, it is upon science that we must fall back for reinspiration. No two leaves are alike, no two lovers. Not only is it true that of all the myriad men that are or ever have been, no two have made love after exactly the same manner, but it is also true that no man can kiss twice the same woman. While he says "I love you," the infinite flow of things has altered the speaking subject, "I," has given a new meaning to the matchless predicate, "love," has caused a change to come upon "you," the beloved object. Today repeats no yesterday that ever was; no tomorrow that ever may be can repeat today. You from whom I parted, saying, "Till we meet again," I never more shall see. Change, that daily, hourly, perpetual death, will have made you other and me other. Shall the new you love the new me more or less than the old you loved the old me? A strange question, truly, sad and strange and unanswerable.

In so changeful a world as is this, a world where nothing is and everything was or is to be, by what miracle of miracles does love last fifty years or even the life of a moon? I know not. I know nothing, not even that I know nothing; but I feel the earth (terra firma, forsooth) spinning through insufferable space and fall to wondering if the solar system knows its way about; and—but what's the use?

Casey Discusses the Democracy

"Do you ramimber, Clancy, phwat Frankling Kay said in his faymis letter to th' Dimmacratic convenshin?"

"Divvle a wur-rd iv it do I ramimber," was the reply.

"Well, I'll refresh your mim'ry," said Casey. "'Fr'rinds an' fellow Dimmacrats,' he said, 'I know,' he said, 'I'm th' logical candidate f'r May'r iv this, my gr-reat city,' he said. 'I know th' people need me,' he said. 'I know,' he said, 'that you know,' he said, 'that th' hand iv Providinse,' he said, 'p'ints to me,' he said, 'an' that a shtill, small voice,' he said, 'cries out, "Lane's the man,"' he said. 'I'm proud,' he said, 'to know,' he said 'that I'm the keeper iv th' people's conshinse,' he said, 'an' that unless I'm illected,' he said, 'th' Divine wrath,' he said, 'will be turned against this gr-reat methroplis,' he said."

"Did no one throw a brick at him?" asked Clancy.

"He wasn't there," said Casey. "It was his letter they were readin'. An' continuin', he said, 'But gintlemin, I'll not run,' he said, 'unless,' he said, 'I receive th' nominashin fr'm th' united Dimmacratic party,' he said. 'The party,' he said, 'must unite on me,' he said, 'or surrind'r to th' Raypublicans,' he said."

"An' they did unite," said Clancy.

"Long enough to intice him out iv his hole," said Casey. "They gave him th' united nominashin an' now they're givin' him th' double-cross."

"Ar-re you f'r him, Casey?"

"Yis, like some more iv them, but I defy any man to look over me sholed'r whin I'm shtampin' me ballot."

"Hasn't he bin known as an honest man?"

"I shouldn't wondher; he's bin known as ivrything fr'm an Apeeaye to a Roman Catholic, almost. But I see th' only thing he's thrue to is timprinse. He preached th' cause iv Spring Valley an' vinegar bitters years ago, an' I see fr'm th' pa-apers that he took a smash at Hinry Crocker th' other night f'r drinkin' beer with th' boys down in the twenty-eighth district. I think he thinks he's runnin' on th' Probishin ticket. He surely can't be ixpectin' a united Dimmacratic vote. If he was he couldn't be makin' a roar about people drinkin' one iv th' beveridges that makes a poor Irishman feel like a rich Jew. He talks as though he ixpects th' votes iv th' Women's Christian Teetotelers' Union."

"Do you think there's a chanst iv him bein' illectid?" asked Clancy.

"Well, I dinnaw," said Casey. "It's never safe to bet on th' Dimmacratic party when it's united as it is in this campaign. Th' number iv Dimmacrats that are wearin' Lane buttons on th' lapels iv their coats, Schmitz buttons on their vests an' Crocker buttons on their suspinders is to my way iv thinkin, just a bit ominis. I'm afraid that there's a prejudice here against a man fr'm Canada. I dinnaw why; it may be on account iv th' recent row over th' Alaskin boundry queschin, an' again it may be on account iv th' number iv Orangemen that shneak over th' border to become American citizens. Far be it fr'm me to disparidge Frankling Kay on account iv his Canadeyin past, but, Clancy—(whisper)—they do say that there's as many Orangemen in Canada as iver dessicated th' soil iv Ireland. However, Clancy, I know my juty as a Dimmacrat. I'm wearin' a Lane button on th' lapel iv me coat, an' I've kept me coat buttoned iver since th' openin' iv this campaign."

"Tell me, Casey, do you sispect him iv bein' an Orangeman?"

"Clancy, I niver expose me suspishins about a man's caricht'r. It's all right to suspishin him f'r your own protecshin if you misthrust him, but you may do him an injustice if you talk about him. All that I know about Lane is that he's from Canada, which in itself is no crime; that when he came to this country he settled in Oakland, which in itself is a suspishis circumstance but not primey fashie evidense, an' furthermore when he calls f'r vinegar bitters an' it isn't on hand he goes to th' orange bitters, a habit that he appears to be unable to shake off. But whatever be his affiliashins, Clancy, you can do him no har-rum by withholding your vote. In one iv his speeches th' other night he said that he could make more money in his profeshin than he could holdin' a job. If that's so, why not let him make an honest livin'?"

"Do you believe him, Casey?"

"I niver shtop to consider whether a man is tellin' th' thruth when his uthrance enables me to act towards him conshinshusly, just as me feelin's were promptin' me to act."

The Saunterer

The Sprague Case

Archbishop Riordan failed to win his suit in behalf of the orphans against Mrs. Richard Sprague (nee Wallace), but the members of the Wallace family have no cause for rejoicing over the result of the trial. Notwithstanding the fact that Ryland B. Wallace, son of Judge William T. Wallace, swore upon the witness stand that the contract upon which the suit was based was executed by him without authority from his client, the jury failed to reach a conclusion. Consequently there must be another trial, and Ryland B. Wallace must again take the witness stand and make a very humiliating spectacle of himself. From the revelations made in this case it appears that the germs of queer moral twists flourish in the Wallace blood. While the onus of whatever is discreditable is on Ryland B. Wallace, an attorney of mature judgment and experience, it appears that he was forced into his embarrassing position by his wealthy sister who would rather have her brother confess that he was guilty of what savors of a breach of the ethics of his profession, than separate herself from a small fraction of her fortune. It also appears that William T. Wallace, an ex-Justice of the Supreme Court of this State, sanctioned the humiliation of his son, and stood by while the latter feebly sought to justify his conduct in the presence of a jury. The best that he could hope for was a verdict of the jury finding that through the unfortunate conduct of his son his daughter was enriched to the extent of twenty-five thousand dollars, but he was denied even the pleasure of that victorious climax.

That Fountain Agreement

It may seem harsh to parade the unusual and extraordinary features of this case, but when people of great wealth and high social standing see fit to balk the efforts of a clergyman in behalf of public charities by invoking legal technicalities based on the questionable conduct of one of their number, I think that sound public policy demands widespread publicity. The history of the case is somewhat complicated. J. Mervyn Donahue was a rich man whose dissipations led to domestic infelicity. His wife forced him to a financial settlement by which she secured a valuable piece of property. Shortly before his death he executed a will bequeathing a large portion of his property to charity. His widow opposed the distribution to charity on the ground that the estate was community property and that therefore he had no right to make the large charitable bequests. Archbishop Riordan, representing the Catholic Charities, agreed, through his attorneys, to consider two-thirds of the estate community property, and to scale down the bequests proportionately. The representatives of other charities declined to enter into this agreement and a contest followed. Meanwhile a question arose regarding a bequest of twenty-five thousand dollars for the erection of a fountain in memory of deceased's father. There was talk of this being a preferred claim, in the nature of a provision for a monument which should come out of the entire estate. If this view were accepted it would be charged against the charities as well as the community property, and therefore it was to the widow's interest that it should be determined to be an ordinary bequest to charity. Ryland B. Wallace, the attorney for and brother of the widow, acting, it was understood, under a power-of-attorney, entered into a written agreement with Archbishop Riordan's attorney to the effect that whatever the decision of the court upon distribution, the fountain bequest should not be charged against the Catholic charities which had agreed to make no contest.

Wallace's Silence

The attorney for the Archbishop went so far as to acquiesce in all that was contended for by Wallace in court, believing of course, that the interests of the orphans were protected under the two agreements. Judge Angelotti decided that the community property was less than two-thirds of the estate. In view of this decision the Catholic charities received twenty-one thousand dollars less than they would have received had the agreement regarding the community property not been made. Incidentally he decreed that the fountain bequest should be included among the legacies to charity, and therefore not be charged against the community property. If it were not for the fountain agreement the Archbishop's attorneys would have appealed from that portion of the decision relating to the fountain bequest, but they relied on the agreement and took no action, never suspecting that Mrs. Sprague would repudiate her brother's action. They allowed her to take her share of the estate, believing that the twenty-five thousand dollars would be forthcoming on demand. But it wasn't. Ryland Wallace offered no explanation, and the time in which to appeal had lapsed. Finally suit was begun, and still the Archbishop could obtain no explanation of Mrs. Sprague's refusal to pay. It was not until Ryland Wallace went on the stand in Judge Morrow's court and swore that he had no authority to make the agreement, his power-of-attorney having been revoked, that Mrs. Sprague's defense was revealed.

Some Remarkable Testimony

The cross-examination of Ryland Wallace is worth reading. He swore that he knew he had no authority to execute the agreement, and he admitted that at no time did he ever intimate to the Archbishop or his attorneys that the agreement was a fraud. By way of palliation of his conduct he said he expected to obtain his sister's approval. Later on, when she failed to ratify the agreement, he remained silent because he believed there would be a compromise. He understood that Archbishop Riordan had a prejudice against litigation, and that he would never sue anybody, and therefore he felt that the transaction would never be exposed. He related also that he signed the agreement to please George R. B. Hayes, who was the attorney for the Archbishop at that time, and he quoted Hayes as saying that it would never amount to anything. Hayes is dead. In justice to Ryland B. Wallace it should be said that there is serious doubt of his having committed a fraud notwithstanding his own positiveness on the subject. Garret McEnerney, the attorney for the Archbishop, is equally positive that Wallace is guiltless so far as his professional conduct relates to the agreement. McEnerney is sure that, notwithstanding the date of the agreement, it was not delivered until several months later, when the power-of-attorney was again in force. He has certain correspondence which corroborates his version of the matter, and he testified that Wallace was wrong so far as the date of the transaction was concerned. But Mrs. Sprague did not rely altogether on her brother's testimony as to his deception. She contended that the agreement was void because it was made without consideration. The other side contends that the community agreement was the consideration. By that agreement the Catholic charities lost twenty-one thousand dollars, and they will be out twenty-five thousand more if they fail to win the suit which on its first trial ended in a disagreement of the jury. Taking a charitable view of the case, Ryland Wallace was led into a predicament through a misapprehension regarding the loyalty of his sister. Of course it would be absurd to speculate as to the view of the case taken by the jurors who heard all the facts, but the attorney for Mrs. Sprague did not rely on the facts. He took occasion to inject a little religion into his argument, which never fails to have effect.

Back From the Old World

Few globe-trotters have such opportunities for insighht into the affairs of the Old World as were enjoyed by John S. Drum, the well-known young attorney of the Tevis estate, who has just returned from a trip through Europe. He spent seven months abroad, and during that period he did not content himself with viewing historical relics, contemplating the surviving grandeurs of the centuries agone, or listening to the stereotyped yarns of voluble guides. Wherever history was being made Drum was there. He was in the House of Lords on the third reading of the Irish Land bill, and he heard the distinguished Duke of Devonshire talk. He says that the Duke is no polished orator, but that he talks straight to the point, and gives the impression that he is a practical man bubbling over with sound sense. Drum was in Belgrade two days after the assassination of the King and Queen, and he found that there was not the slightest bit of excitement. Business was progressing as if nothing unusual had happened, and people discussed the crime, when questioned, just as though it were an incident of trivial importance. He visited Rome, and attended one of Pope Leo's closing receptions. It was about two months before Leo's death and he was then very feeble. His attendants sought to persuade him to discontinue the receptions, but he said that he had no other excitement, and as he had heard that there were many German pilgrims who came a great distance to visit them he insisted upon seeing them. Mr. Drum was among the pilgrims. He says that it was like a death-bed reception, the aged pontiff being in a reclining position in a chair, surrounded by his attendants, and among them was his physician. Notwithstanding his weak condition he spoke a few words to each visitor.

He Saw the Sultan

Mr. Drum was in Naples at the time of King Edward's visit. The two Crown Princes of Germany and Queen Amelia of Portugal were also there. Later on he visited the dominions of the Sultan, and had a good look at the Turkish potentate. The Sultan visits a mosque just outside the walls of the city every Friday, a custom which he inaugurated because the death of a predecessor was concealed for a long time from his subjects. He says that the people may see him every Friday and that if he doesn't visit the mosque they will know he is dead. He makes the trip in a ceremonious fashion, and it is made the occasion for a procession of troops and also of the ladies of the harem, who are in closed carriages, alongside of which walk tall young eunuchs. Among other interesting things that Mr. Drum learned was that the Sultan's harem is about two miles distant from his palace. It is on the shores of the Bosporous, but it is connected with the palace by a pathway enclosed by walls sixteen feet high. The Sultan doesn't visit his harem but when he wishes to commune with one of his two hundred wives he sends a courier for her. There are many of them who haven't had a chat with the old chap for many a moon, and they are very lonesome. Occasionally all the ladies of the harem are given an airing on the Bosporous, and that is about the only excitement they have. On such occasions they become very gay, and try very hard to get up a flirtation.

A Poet's Neglected Grave

An occasional correspondent writes me, from Paris, that pilgrimages are now being made to the grave of that unfortunate genius, Oscar Wilde. He also says that there is talk of exhuming his dust and conveying it to England for reinterment. The reaction has set in, and cultured people are now eager to pay tribute to the memory of the poor, degenerate poet who died in exile, dishonored and disgraced. He lies far out from Paris in a distant suburb, a place called Bagneux. It is a neglected graveyard, covering an immense stretch of territory, a place where lie the bourgeois of the Parisian suburbs. The grave is covered with weeds, marked by a simple gravestone, bearing his name and age and a verse from Job. Interest has also been awakened of late in the Hotel d'Alsace in the Rue des Beaux-Arts, where the poet died in misery and while suffering intense pain. It has been learned that during the last months of his life he did hack work for people who published it as their own. The landlord of the hotel was Wilde's benefactor. Although he put him out of the house for non-payment of his room-rent, he afterwards met him in the street, and learning that he was without shelter, persuaded him to return to his old quarters. He also went to another hotel where Wilde's trunk was held and settled his bill amounting to twenty-five dollars. He is treasuring the receipted bill as a souvenir.

The Phantom Burglar

Alice Hager is suspected of an ambition to elevate the stage, and all because of that press-agent story about her search for a burglar with a pistol in one hand, a candle in the other and a determined look in both eyes. The rumor is that she contemplated starring herself in a melodrama entitled, "The Female Hawkshaw, or the Burglar That Never Came," but I am authoritatively informed that there is nothing in the story. The suspicion regarding her histrionic aspirations was no doubt due to the fact that the newspaper accounts of her courageous search for a burglar bore all the familiar traces of the press agent's yarn. It is usual for a society woman with histrionic aspirations to hire a press agent, but Miss Hager disclaims a yearning for the footlights. She won't even admit that she has a press agent, but it is hard to believe that any genuine newspaper man wrote those ridiculous stories. The one in the Bulletin was especially press agenty, since it contained this statement: "She has an enviable golf record, so it did not occur to her to sit still and scream." Thus was the fact that Miss Hager is a corker on the links dragged into the story. Of course an enviable golf record is not a prophylactic against the screaming habit, and no young woman should be deluded into the notion that by acquiring skill in the game she may overcome the inclination to yell when she sees a mouse or persuades herself that a desperado is under the bed.

"His wife doesn't speak to him when he's drunk."
"And I've been wondering why he stayed on such long jags."

Rulofson's Legacy

The decision of the Supreme Court of California in the case of A. C. Rulofson's inheritance of four hundred thousand dollars from an eccentric sea captain was not final, as many who read the romantic story suppose, for it merely referred the case back to the lower court for a rehearing. Along the lines of the Supreme Court's ruling the case would appear to be decidedly in Rulofson's favor, and his friends are joining with him in the hope that a final judgment will soon be made granting him the award of his guardian of early days.

The Unconventional Mrs. Savage

Since the death of Colonel Richard Henry Savage in New York a great deal has been written about him, but I have seen very little on the subject of his wife, who is a unique personality. Mrs. Savage is a remarkably handsome woman. She is of German birth, but her first husband being a Russian she preferred to be called "La Belle Russe." She was a noted lobbyist, and she handled some very important measures for the Russian government. She was instrumental in securing the acceptance of the bid of the American Fur Company for sealing privileges in Alaska, and I have heard that she received ten thousand dollars from Lloyd Tevis and D. O. Mills for her services. During her residence in this city she was noted for her indifference to the conventions. On one occasion she stimulated gossip by presiding at the floral booth of a church fair in an extremely decollete ball gown. In the days when General McDowell was the host at Black Point it was related that Mrs. Savage attended a reception there without an invitation. However she approached the hostess with outstretched hand, saying, "I have not the pleasure, Madame, but—." She was interrupted by Mrs. McDowell who told her that she had made a mistake; that it was some other reception to which she had been invited.

Much less was written of Colonel Savage's death than one would have expected, remembering the sensation his novel, "My Official Wife," made at the time of its publication. The success of that work, by the way, was largely due to the clever editing of Archie Gunter, who cut out all the non-essential chapters and retained only the dramatic features. In its play form it was presented in this city by Minnie Seligman and her then husband, Bob Cutting, the latter appearing as the titled Russian. Colonel Savage was the son of Savage, the iron man, whose death shortly preceded that of the author, and he was a brother of Lincoln Savage, the attorney. Though at one time Colonel Savage had plenty of money, he died poor and in debt, I am told.

Is Going East to be Married

Lee Burgess Raymond will leave next Tuesday for Conneant, Ohio, where he is to renounce his bachelorhood. The bride-elect is Miss Marion Watson, whose people are of Conneant's inner circle. Mr. Raymond is a nephew of Dr. O. O. Burgess, the pioneer physician of San Francisco. He is an enthusiast over baseball and lacrosse, and is an athletic young fellow. He will return shortly with his bride, after enjoying a honeymoon trip in the South.

A Broken Trothplight

Word comes to me that the engagement of Emmett Sullivan, Frank Sullivan's brother, with a noble Italian lady has been broken. Emmett Sullivan, it will be remembered, was educated abroad and though he returned here and stayed two years, he did not care to remain. He went abroad again and has remained there ever since, passing most of his time near Brussels, where he moves in the highest society. The old home of the Sullivans in Oak street, by the way, is at present closed up.

The Liars of the Press

To lie with impunity appears to be the privilege of the up-to-date daily newspaper. There was a time when character was believed to be essential to success in journalism, but that theory has long since been abandoned. High ethical principles no longer enter into the methods of the enterprising modern daily. It is deemed consistent with professional ethics to bolster up a bad cause by judicious prevarication. Witness for instance the conduct of the local dailies in the present campaign. All of them appear to be acting upon the presumption that the exigencies of a spirited political contest release them from the obligation of truthfulness. Much of their lying is quite palpable. Many of their narratives appear to have been construed without an effort at verisimilitude. But occasionally there is a deftness in their lying which renders their yarns somewhat plausible, but on the whole it is of a character that indicates a very low estimate of the intelligence of their readers. Nothing could be more ridiculous than the story published by one of the dailies to the effect that William F. Herrin had issued orders through ex-Secretary of State Brown to desert Crocker and get behind Schmitz. Brown was referred to as a Herrin lieutenant though it is well known in political circles that Brown is a disgruntled Republican who was long ago repudiated by the Republican leaders, and who has been behind the Ruef band-wagon ever since the opening of the campaign. Of course the purpose of the story was to create the impression that Crocker was growing weak and to secure for Lane the vote of all conservative people who are intent upon defeating Schmitz.

Lane's Misrepresentation

It may be urged in extenuation of the misrepresentation of the dailies that they are frequently given erroneous information, but the prevarication of Franklin K. Lane cannot be accounted for upon any such hypothesis. When Mr. Lane announces from the platform that during his term of office no money has been spent in the employment of special counsel to attend to the city's litigation, he is not laboring under any misapprehension. His purpose is to glorify himself, and he does not hesitate to trifle with the truth. It was during Mr. Lane's term of office that special counsel was retained by the Civil Service Commissioners to test the question raised by the employes of the County Clerk's office when they denied that they were subject to civil service regulations.

The Inquisitive Wag

The wag in the gallery contributes to the gayety of many an assemblage, and he is usually alert in campaign times. He amused himself at the expense of General Salomon, one night recently, at a Republican meeting. The General has a fine war record and he has not neglected to hint at it since his nomination for District Attorney. In the opening of the campaign he related that about the time his opponent was struggling to get into the world he (Salomon) was having a horse shot under him at Gettysburg. Later on he increased the number to five horses, and at one meeting a voice in the gallery asked:

"Were you shot, General?"

The General took no notice of the interruption. He was about to resume when a voice from another part of the gallery asked:

"Were you half-shot, General?"

The Gaiety of the Campaign

The most amusing contributions to the literature of this campaign have come from those merchants who take themselves so seriously that they imagine the whole city is anxious to know how they are going to vote. Several of them have permitted themselves to be made ridiculouus by partisan newspapers intent upon influencing the "silent" vote. The inveigling of poor old Asa Wells into the gallery of contributors was positively cruel. The old gentleman is so sick that he hasn't been out of his hotel for months, and yet he was persuaded to express the conviction that Lane was leading the race. Of course he based his opinion in a measure upon what he had been reading in the newspapers, and with him the wish was largely father to the thought. He was beaten two years ago, and it would pain him to see a Republican win this time. So he was given an opportunity to publicly expose his soreness. Nearly all the other men who expressed the opinion that Lane was going to win were job-chasers of the old Phelan push, or men who had reasonable expectation of being appointed to some commissionership in the event of Lane's winning. The Lane organs have been strenuously seeking, during the week, to swing the doubtful voters, the men who want to beat Schmitz, over to the Democratic candidate, by misrepresenting matters regarding the strength of Crocker. The fear of the Republican leaders was that Lane wouldn't hold a sufficient number of his own party votes to insure the election of Crocker. That Lane is a bad third was generally admitted, even in the Bulletin office, where he was touted the most vociferously, and hence the screeching headlines born of desperation.

As to the "Graft"

For the first time in the history of a municipal campaign the people have ceased to take an interest in any contest save that of the Mayoralty. The Chief Executiveship of this city is now recognized as a big prize, and that is why there is such absorbing interest in the fight over it. It remained for Eugene Schmitz and Abe Ruef to awaken people to the importance of the Mayor's office. Heretofore it was considered important only because of the dignity attached to it, and the number of departments of the Government under the Mayor's direct control. But now people are thinking of the size of the "graft." The other day a prominent merchant of this city informed Treasurer Arthur Fisk of the Crocker campaign committee that he would be willing to put twenty thousand dollars into Mr. Crocker's fight on condition that he be promised a police commissionership. Of course he figured that the job would enable him to increase his business. But that is not where the "graft" comes in. There are over thirty-five hundred saloons in this city, and many saloon-keepers have found it expedient to retain an attorney during the Schmitz regime. Supposing only half of them deemed a regular attorney essential to their business, and supposing that he exacted only twenty dollars a month from each. How long would it take for his fees to aggregate half a million dollars? How many saloon-keepers do you think Abe Ruef represented before the Police Commissioners in the past two years?

He Is Not "All Right"

Governor Pardee has come to the conclusion that he was handed a gold-brick when Tompkins was appointed Warden of San Quentin. He was consulted by the commissioners in reference to the appointment, and though he at first objected to Tompkins he was assured that the latter would be "all right," and he gave his consent. So the appointment was made, but the new Warden has proved "all wrong" so far as Pardee is concerned. The Governor has been given no share in the patronage of the prison. He hasn't influence enough with the Warden to secure the appointment of a guard.

The Bret Harte Jinks

One of the most successful jinks ever given by the Bohemian Club was that of last Saturday night—the Bret Harte Jinks—which is likely to result in a San Francisco monument to the famous author of "The Luck of Roaring Camp." A design for a monument has been submitted by "Bobby" Aitken and, contrary to general expectation, instead of being "The Luck of Roaring Camp" it is from "Tennessee's Pardner" and shows a miner mourning over a new-made grave. The Jinks was one of the most novel in the history of Bohemia and made even blase members sit up and take notice. Some of the disaffected members who come for a little while to scoff and then go over to the "Family" and knock the whole show were so interested that they remained to bray their approval. On the walls of the jinks room were cheap nudes such as one sees in country saloons, and the pictures were shrouded in mosquito netting. On the ceiling was that perforated tissue paper used to lure the unwary fly and keep him off the furnishings and all else was hidden by gunny-sacking. All about the room were odd signs with "S's" facing the wrong way and queer misspelling, such as:—

"No mixed drinks; you've got to take our whiskey strate."

"Gentlemen will pleas not spit on the floor. The banker is with us tonite."

At the head of the stairs, receiving each man as he came up, was Charlie Dickman, made up in black wig and huge black moustache as a Jewish proprietor of a faro game. He had diamonds as big as walnuts all over him and he wore a wonderful Prince Albert with bindings an inch wide, and a silk hat with a straight brim.

Some of the Features

The programs were fearful and wonderful things and the names under which well-known men masqueraded were clever in themselves. Sandy Stewart of Red Dog, Yuba Bill Irwin, Joaquin Miller, Lanky Field, Shorty Somers, Deadeye Dixon, Buster Bobby Aitken, Charley Stoddard of Massachusetts Bar, Sojer Soule, Comanche Shiels, Saintly Sabin of Blazing Star, Roaring Rickard, "Judge" Melvin, Wingdam Wendell—these were a few. The performance opened with a chorus, "The Owl and the Coyote," dedicated to Bret Harte. The words were by Charles S. Aiken, the clever young editor who has made such a success of the Sunset magazine, and who sired the Jinks. The music was by Theodore Vogt and the chorus was sung by eight men from Red Dog, Lusty Lamberton, Wingdam Wendell, Lanky Field, Grasshopper Bakewell, Saleratus Sis Hopkins, Ginger Pop Nielsen, "Judge" Melvin and Shorty Somers. All of these men were in picturesque costumes as miners, gamblers or tenderfeet. It should be said, too, that the front part of the Jinks Room was set with tables at which gamblers and miners sat and played and swore. Billy Smith was dressed as a Mexican senorita and his attendant was Gordon Ross, a cowboy. When someone insulted Billy, the cowboy promptly whipped out a gun and wiped the intruder off the earth. The killing was voted justifiable by the crowd and the corpse, represented by Bobby Aitken, was promptly hustled out without further ado.

Other Reminiscent Material

The swearing throughout the performance was beautiful and picturesque and the visiting bankers could scarcely have had a more moving picture of California pioneer life. After the Sire's opening remarks came a poem by Charles Warren Stoddard, "The Silent Singer." Joaquin Miller talked of Bret Harte, the Man, and H. A. Melvin made one of the hits of the evening by singing Bret Harte's "Heathen Chinee," set to some very clever music by W. J. McCoy. Frank Soule's paper was entitled "Recollections," and Ina Coolbrith's poem on Bret Harte was read by Frank Deering. Thomas Rickard sang Bret Harte's beautiful "Two Ships," set to music by Wallace Sabin and Will Irwin's paper, conceded the best of the evening, though he did not read it very distinctly, was entitled "Harte's Gift to California." Dr. Jack Shiels gave a recitation, "Dow's Flat," and Homer Henley sang "The Angelus," music by Dr. Stewart. After an intermission, during which there were two serious speeches by visitors, neither of them on the program, and the gourmets of the club had treated their startled stomachs to brown bread, pork and beans, two kinds of pie and beer (nothing else had been provided) there were part songs by the chorus, and then a scene, "His Answer to Her Letter," very cleverly worked up in stage business by Dick Hotaling as Truthful James, and Jo of Poverty Flat, who was Dr. Shiels. The chorus sang another song, "The Owl," words by Porter Garnett, music by McCoy, and then came the side-splitting Spanish Dance, with Billy Smith as Rag Gulch Rosie and the lissome Gordon Ross as Lofty Louis. Pungent Prose" was the title of Charlie Field's clever paper and then there was a drinking song, "Crossing the Bar." The last tableau, "Dickens in Camp," was highly affecting and charming.

The Next Jinks

There is probably not a club in the world that can furnish such clever specialties in a literary and musical way as those that have made the Bohemian Club famous. For the next jinks they are talking of having a clever satire on "Everyman" to be called "Every Member." It is to be a record of the Progress of every member from the initiation fee to the manager's office, when he is hauled up for non-payment of dues, and will describe every member's trials and tribulations, especially his financial ones, with many witty take-offs on prominent members. The scenario is said to be side-splitting.

The Club Must Move

The Bohemian Club will be forced to move from its present quarters within the next few months. The lease of the building at Post street and Grant avenue will soon expire and the owner does not care to renew it as the income from an office building on that site would be much larger than the rental paid by the club. The members are in a quandary and although time flies no suitable building has yet been found. The Levi Strauss residence at Post and Leavenworth streets is for sale and has been considered. The house would either be entirely remodeled, or torn down and a new building erected. But the price of one hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars gives the directors pause. It would virtually mean paying a small fortune for the lot alone, considering the improvements necessary. Another objection is the location, which many of the members contend is too far up town.

The Pity of It

If the new world—particularly the western side of it—would only learn repose! At a smart little dinner the other night, two gracious daughters of the house were doing the honors, with a zest that betokened an honest fear that all things beyond the scenes were not propitious. Conversation waxed more brilliant as the intervals between courses lengthened. Anxious glances toward the head of the table were unavailing, for Mrs. Malaprop, during one of the breath-takings, addressed the nearest guest in audible confidence: "And to think I pay that Chinaman fifty dollars!" It takes the three proscribed generations to breed an indifference to the whimsies of the culinary department.

Ladies to Cater for Club Men

The gentle sex is invading all avenues of industry nowadays. Nobody ever thought that they would break into a gentleman's club, but they have. The cuisine of the University Club, which once attracted gourmets, has lately been the worst ever. Frank J. Symmes, the financier with the hypnotic eye, undertook to run the club on an economical basis, and after he had afflicted half the members with dyspepsia, the other half fled to the Pacific-Union. The cuisine was then pronounced impossible, and finally a demand was made for a change, and by way of experiment the Misses Friedlander were engaged to do the catering. The Friedlanders were once society girls whose father was as noted for his hospitality as they were for the clever satire in which they occasionally indulged. They are competent judges of a chef's art, and they know the sort of menu that tickles an epicure's palate. Hereafter the University Club will be well fed.

Glad Miss Dean Is Going Away

All the buds and belles are secretly rejoicing that Miss Helen Dean has determined to spend the winter abroad. They have been quaking in their little shoes for fear she wouldn't. Miss Dean is the most popular girl who has come out in many seasons, and when her engagement is announced more than one girl will say fervently, "Allah be praised." Miss Dean has an invincible combination of good looks, manner, family influence, cleverness and money. Most debutantes have at the most but three of these essentials to social success and they are easily eclipsed by such a young woman as Miss Dean. She was persona gratissima to the army and navy set, to which, by the way, a girl is seldom warmly welcomed unless she is rated well in Bradstreet's for it would be suicidal for an army or navy man to marry a poor girl. Alma McClung was an exception. Miss Dean was enthused over in both the army and navy, and Lieutenant Skipwith of the Marblehead, who was attentive to Lurline Spreckels for awhile, was later on the devoted cavalier of Miss Dean. But with that young woman in Europe the less attractive girls will have their chance to shine, and they are all hoping that she may marry abroad.

The Moan of the Debutantes

This season the debutantes are less numerous than last. At the De Young vaudeville last season reference was made to the debutante crisis. Mistress Mary, when watering her pots, had these lines sung to her:

"Oh, Mistress Mary, quite contrary, how is your garden now?
Silver bells and cockle shells, and debutantes all in a row?"

The debutantes say it wouldn't be so bad if they didn't have to compete against belles of several seasons, grass-widows and flirty young married women.

Mrs. Darling's Epigram

When Mrs. John A. Darling announced the engagement of her daughter, Mrs. Louise de la Montagne, with C. E. Maud, the golf champion, no one was surprised. Mrs. Montagne is a Hastings, and there is a prejudice in the Hastings family against grass-widowhood. Mrs. Darling, the mother of Mrs. Montagne, has said that woman should be maid, wife or widow; that a divorcee has no status. When she married for the second time she said she felt that she owed it to mankind. "It wouldn't be fair," she said, "to go to my grave thinking marriage a failure without giving it a second trial." And she has been happy ever since, for the Darlings are devoted to each other. Mrs. Darling, by the way, approves of divorce as a remedy for evils that resist other curatives. When discussing the matter one day this brilliant woman dropped this epigram: "Divorce runs in our family, but there are worse things—locomotor ataxia, for instance."

The De La Montagnes

Mrs. de la Montagne's husband that was, Ernest de la Montagne, was once a great power on the turf. He was deeply interested in blooded horseflesh, and his only other passions were his wife and little son, to whom for a time he was devoted. It was when the wife was abroad that her husband began to be "whispered" in the New York smart set. De la Montagne's infatuation for the wife of a Philadelphia stock-broker became the talk of two cities, and as the whispers increased in volume they were megaphoned across the ocean. His wife, who has her mother's spirit and decision of character, promptly sent him an ultimatum which he did not heed, and she then notified him that he was no longer her husband.

Rose Hooper's Marriage

The buds won't have much to fear from the bachelor girls this winter, for there are few of the latter left to dispute the palm for belleship. Rose Hooper is the latest defection from the ranks of the bachelor maids. She was married early this week to Charles A. Plotner, in the East, and is expected to return to San Francisco soon and set up a menage of her own. Miss Hooper is a clever girl, not a beauty, but refined and sensible. She has a lot of business acumen, and accumulated quite a fat bank account by the sale of her miniatures. She is one of our best miniaturists. She is also a daring equestrienne and was at one time one of the star riders of the San Francisco Riding Club.

Mr. and Mrs. Charles D. Blaney of San Jose have left for Chicago where they will spend the winter with the parents of Mrs. Blaney. Mrs. Blaney's father is millionaire Williams of the "windy" city. Next spring they will go abroad and spend some time in Egypt.

Recent arrivals at Byron Hot Springs were W. O. B. Macdonough, Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Kirkpatrick, Miss Olive Findley, Dr. James W. Keeney and his two boys, Mrs. W. S. Gage, Mrs. Alexander Boyd and Mrs. H. St Clair Boyd and T. S. Bergin.

Smart Sunday School Children Will Appear

Society, the Episcopalian end of it, is interesting itself in the benefit for the P. E. Old Ladies' Home, which will take place on the thirteenth and fourteenth of November in Lyric hall. The affair is under the patronage of all the Episcopal churches. It is to be rather unique in scope, taking the form of "A Day and Night in a Toy Shop." The dolls will be impersonated by children from Trinity, Grace, St. Luke's and the other Episcopalian churches. Miss Jean Logan is drilling them in their songs and dances.

Premature Anticipation

Anent the felicitous denouement of a certain romance, there is a side on which the lime-light of public criticism has not been turned. It is a remarkable finish to a bit of the comedie humain, one unprecedented and omitted from the calculations of the fair matron in question. A young wife is receiving the congratulations of relatives and friends on the improved health of her liege-lord and master, while to her secret soul, and, possibly to the best friend, she confides her plaints of disappointment and chagrin. The gentleman concerned, none other than the lady's husband, on the nuptial eve gave promise of a speedy translation. Inwardly cherishing dreams of freedom, the bride gladly agreed to the trip across the pond, and while in the shadow of the Parisian Mecca, selected an entire wardrobe of sombre and fetching millinery. But alas for hopes of mortals! Lazarus-like, the groom, full of years and sanguine of the future, has risen from his bed, and gently but firmly reclaims his ante-widow from premature mourning. In the sacredness of the boudoir there is much bitterness, and the best friend whispers to the impassive bull-pup: "But you should see that crape!"

The wedding of Miss Genevieve Carolan and Harry Poett will be rather a large, smart house affair, although the invitations have not been general. It will occur on the seventeenth of November, at the home of the bride's parents.

She's Pretty and Modish

At the Bruce-Stephenson wedding one of the prettiest frocks was worn by Miss Bessie Dunsmuir. Miss Dunsmuir, who is the daughter of the former Premier of British Columbia, the millionaire coal dealer, has been at the Palace a few days and has been much rushed by her friends. She visited San Francisco some years ago, so she has many acquaintances here. Miss Dunsmuir is a very pretty girl who has had the benefit of travel, which adds so much to one's conversational powers.

The Rustics Were There

The reception given to the visiting bankers by the local plutocrats at the Mark Hopkins house last week was a little indiscriminate, as those functions invariably are. Perhaps this indiscrimination was responsible for the olla podrida of dress exhibited. San Francisco usually distinguishes itself by doing the wrong thing in clothes. There were perhaps fifty women in the house in correct evening clothes; the rest were in anything from shirt waists to day-reception gowns with evening hats. By far the majority of the women had their heads covered. It was a crush but there was a good supper, and quite a number of society women assisted "behind the line." The motley garments did not matter much, though, for the Eastern nabobs were conspicuous by their absence. The only strangers present were the representatives of country banks who had a "perfectly lovely time."

Where Style Was Exhibited

This was not true of the reception given by the ladies of the Century Club to the prominent ladies the same week. All of the New York women attended that reception and the gowns were really beautiful, likewise the wraps. The Grill at the palace was interesting during the stay of the visitors. Many of the women dined nightly in the splendor of bare shoulders and full evening dress and the restaurant had all the gayety of an opera season. Even the employes of the hotel noticed the difference in appearance between these people and the Christian Endeavorers, the Epworth Leaguers, the Knights of Pythias and the Grand Army Vets who occasionally swarm down on the city. In spite of the moralists it would seem that the quest for the root of all evil improves the taste, the manners, the appearance and the dress—all honor to the Root.

Mrs. Baxter-Tevis's Aunt

Among the visiting bankers none made more friends than Mr. "Gus" Robertson, who is president of one of the banks of Nashhville, Tenn., and a very jovial and witty companion. The Nashville banker has his wife with him on the trip. They were married thirty-one years ago, and are still a charming pair of lovers. Mrs. Robertson is a typical Southern woman of the sweet, clinging type. She was a Miss Baxter, and is an aunt of Mrs. Cornelia Baxter-Tevis.

Exhibited Their Frocks

A novel feature of the ball given by the Daughters of the Confederacy was a society reporter of one of the dailies who was detailed to write a description of the gowns. Her work was most graciously facilitated, for the women subjected themselves to the deepest scrutiny, and were apparently delighted at the prospect of having their fine feathers described in a morning paper. They turned round for inspection, wheeling from right to left so that every good point of the costume could be seen, and not a few of them called attention to some of the trimmings. There was a woful lack of dancing men at the ball, and Jimmy Phelan helped out wonderfully.

A Kick from the Debutantes

The new dance-hall at the Palace does not meet with the approval of some of the debutantes because it has no gallery. It has been customary for the chaperons to retire to the dim recesses of the gallery where they dozed or played whist during the dances. When a girl knew that her duenna was nodding in a chair she felt free to indulge in a little mild flirtation, or if she desired, a "bonny hug." In the new hall there is no accommodation for the dragons except in the full glare of the ball-room. Consequently the members of the Fortnightlies will see more of Mrs. Salisbury this winter. Last season she was accustomed to seek seclusion, and to appear periodically to vociferously applaud a pretty figure. She is less active than Czar Greenway, who is always in evidence at his dances watching with the greatest interest the various intricate evolutions. He demands skilful execution in the cotillions. Unfortunately he is a little too heavy nowadays to give perfect satisfaction to a fair partner and they do say (whisper it not in Gath) that his sense of rhythm is not very keen. However the girls feel that it is quite an honor to dance with the social dictator.

Has Miles Been Forgiven?

The presence of General Miles at the ball of the Sidney Johnston Chapter of the Daughters of the Confederacy occasioned a great deal of surprise. General Miles has been very bitterly execrated by Southern people for his conduct toward Jefferson Davis during the latter's imprisonment. He has been accused of having treated the President of the Confederacy in a most brutal manner, and though many of the old sores have been healed it is frequently asserted that General Miles was never forgiven by the people of the South. So strong is the feeling of the people in the Southern States that when General Miles's Presidentiai boom was on it was said that it would be suicidal for the Democratic party to select him for a standard-bearer. Evidently the ladies of Sidney Johnston Chapter do not share the prejudices of their sisters of the Solid South, or else they regarded General Miles as too big a lion to overlook on the occasion of their big function. It should be interesting to hear what the ladies of Jefferson Davis Chapter have to say on the subject.

His Tardy Reward

"Dick" Wainwright's promotion to a captaincy has come none too soon. As the commanding officer of the plucky little Gloucester, formerly Pierpont Morgan's yacht Corsair, Wainwright did work at the battle of Santiago which was so conspicuous for its gallantry, dash and skill, that in any other navy but ours he would have been advanced from his grade of lieutenant-commander to captain at once. Some other vessels have made feeble claims to having put the two Spanish destroyers Pluton and Furor out of that action, but there is little doubt that it was entirely the work of the Gloucester, which tackled them both single-handed, going straight for them as soon as they were sighted and not letting up until they were both sunk.

"Deacon" Bootes

Long-sparred Captain John T. Bootes, of the Marines, has just received an agreeable and novel assignment in Washington, where he has been placed in charge of a newly formed school for gunnery sergeants of his corps. The selection of Bootes for the detail was an excellent one, for he is a fine officer. He stands six feet four in his stocking feet, and is broad-shouldered and deep-chested in proportion, a typical grenadier. He is an Annapolis graduate, class of '85, but stood so low in his studies that the provisions of the silly Robeson bill caused his muster out, in 1887, with a year's sea pay, despite the fact that he was recognized as an admirable officer. He went into railroading after that, and did splendidly, but when war's alarums were sounded in 1898 he dropped his peaceful duties like a flash and hurried to the front. He was commissioned a lieutenant, junior grade, in the Navy, and served creditably throughout the war, after which he was again mustered out, but not for long. The new taste for the military life for which he was born impelled him to enter the reorganized Marine Corps as second lieutenant, and he has now rapidly advanced to his present grade of captain. There is no better soldier in the corps than "Deacon" Bootes, and his popularity with all his brother officers is great.

To Improve the Naval Militia

I see that Commander W. J. Barnette, United States Navy, who is the officer detailed to represent the Navy Department in affairs pertaining to the naval militia of the various States, is considering the recommendation of some such governmental aid and supervision for the naval militia as the Dick bill provided for the National Guard. It is devoutly to be wished. If the Navy Department were enabled to take some cognizance and have some hand in the control of these bodies, there would not be such spectacles of comical inefficiency as the California naval militia now presents.

Cupid at Annapolis

A married midshipman is a rare bird in the United States Navy, but one—the only one in the service—has just been caught, Midshipman Newman K. Perry having been wedded this month at Stockbridge, Mass., with Miss Marie V. De R. Doane, of that pretty little New England town. There have been very few instances of young officers of such low rank entering the married state. Some twenty years ago, a "middy" was married within a fortnight after his graduation from the four-years academic course, during which marriage is forbidden by the regulations. In spite of this regulation, however, there was a case in 1881, when a cadet still at the Naval Academy married a pretty little girl from Baltimore, and all might have gone well had not the young husband been taken ill. Learning that her spouse was confined to the hospital, the bride cast discretion to the winds and hastened to his bedside, thus exposing the whole pretty romance. Of course, the youthful benedick's resignation followed as soon as he was able to leave the sick quarters. I believe he is now a business man in Baltimore.

Colonel David Porter Heap, of the Corps of Engineers, United States Army, has been receiving congratulations upon the birth, in this city, some days ago, of his little daughter, who has been named Emma Ambert Heap. The Heaps are nearly as well known on the Pacific Coast as they are in Washington, D. C., where they form a part of the exclusive "Old Resident Set" of the capital city. Like many of the sons of those old Washington families, the Heap men have sought careers in the Army and Navy.

The wife of Colonel "Jack" Chamberlain, and Mrs. Castner, wife of Captain Castner, are going out to Manila on the transport that sails today. Mrs. Castner was formerly Ada White of this city. Miss Marie Voorhies is also leaving. Lieutenant Leahy, the fiancee of Miss Louise Harrington, has been ordered away for several months, and their wedding will consequently not take place before next spring.

I hear that Mrs. Kierstedt (Edith McBean) is greatly pleased at the prospect of living in Washington for a year. Dr. Kierstedt has been ordered there to study for twelve months. Mrs. McBean accompanied her daughter. Mrs. Kierstedt is not troubled by the usual financial deprivations of an officer's wife, for her parents are very generous to her.

The Official National Air

According to orders received on this coast from Washington, "The Star Spangled Banner" shall hereafter be regarded as the sole national air for flag-raising and all other purposes in the navy. For many years the navy has been treating "Hail Columbia" as a national air, just as a good many people on shore treat "America," the air of which was stolen from the British national anthem. Now that "The Star Spangled Banner" is the official national air of the navy it would be well for all hands to learn the words.

The fiancee of Lieutenant Mitchell of the Albatross is really a beautiful girl, though she is not one of those beauties who see their pictures in the society columns of the dailies on Sundays. Miss Mabel Quatman has more than the mere pulchritude of face and figure, for she is clever and sings charmingly. She is a sister of Al and George Quatman, the real estate men, and of Mrs. George Perkins of Oakland.

Miss Edythe Henderson, who was married to John F. Norton last week, once intended to seek fame in a stage career, but her family objected, so she remained in private life. She is an accomplished musician and can dance like a professional danseuse.

Colonel A. G. Hawes is in New York, after a short visit in Washington, D. C., where he met Ambrose Bierce and other ex-San Franciscans.

Mr. J. Kemp Bartlett, vice-president and counsel of the United States Fidelity and Guaranty Company of New York, is visiting San Francisco. Mr. Bartlett is from Baltimore and is being largely entertained during his stay here.

A Society Baritone

The Twentieth Century Club is very much interested in the debut of Willard Young, who will make his first appearance as a concert baritone on Wednesday evening at Miss Alexander's recital. Mr. Young's voice is said to be a remarkably fine one. He has sung in church choirs and I believe cherishes operatic ambition. He has relatives galore in society.

The Stork Did It

Mrs. William P. Morgan is rejoicing over the arrival of granddaughter who has quite reconciled her to the marriage of her son which, at first, she did not hail with much glee. The little girl is to bear the name of her august grandparent and has already been the recipient of her bounty, for Mrs. Morgan senior presented the entire layette. The young mother almost gave up her life for the little one and there was danger at one time that her death might ruin the joy of the Morgan-Davis nuptials, but that was happily averted and now every one is joyful.

The Confusion of Tongues

All society is wondering how a certain newly married pair will get along now that they are bound for better, for worse. Both of the parties to this recent marriage have high tempers and both have been spoiled, but it is said that during a rather long engagement they have quarreled so bitterly and made up so rapturously that they are quite used to the process, and their nearest and dearest are not anxious at all concerning the durability of their nuptials.

In the Audience

The opening Nordica concert was quite a fashionable affair, and many of the ladies in the audience wore handsome toilettes. Nordica herself wore her magnificent tourquoises in a tiara and a necklace. They are as large as quarters and set with diamonds. There were several small theatre parties but most people were in family groups. General Shafter constituted a group in himself, and wedged into an opera chair from which he did not dare attempt to extract himself during the performance. He was accompanied by his daughter, Mrs. McKittrick. Mrs. Irvine was there with her two sons, James W. and Callaghan Byrne. "Jack" Parrott had two of his daughters with him, sweet girls who are to make their debut this winter. The Louis Parrotts and their daughter Marie Louise were also there. Mrs. Alexander Keyes looked well in white and pink. She wore a white tailor suit with pink blouse and hat. Dr. Harry Tevis had as guests the Harry Mendells.

Our Beautiful Designs

are now town talk. Our jewelry has become popular for the beautiful and artistic effect which is not exceeded in the genuine diamonds themselves and are worn by lovers of the beautiful, regardless of their comparative inexpensiveness.

The Alexandra manufactured diamonds are cut and faceted to even a higher lustre than the real stones themselves and may be detected from the more expensive jewelry only by the eye of an expert.

The pearls are manufactured from a composition of fishskin and silver, and are so genuine in appearance as to defy detection.

An Ill-Bred Audience

The audience that attended the opening performance of the Metropolitan orchestra at the Alhambra insisted on getting its money's worth. Its demands for more songs from Nordica went beyond the bounds of courtesy, but the great diva took pity on provincial musical lovers, and she showed no displeasure at the tax on her graciousness. But when the boors in the audience began to swarm out of the theatre before the performance was over, the members of the orchestra looked surprised and amused. From the expression on Nahan Franko's face I imagined that he reflected that it was what artists should expect when they wander far away from civilization.

Max Hirsch, who is directing the Duss-Nordica-Fisk-Franco tour, is paying his third visit to San Francisco. He was here twice with the Grau grand opera company, and is on speaking terms with most of our smart people and clubmen. Hirsch is a very distinguished looking man, with prematurely gray hair. He has had loads of experience with whimsical operatic stars, and when he came before the curtain Tuesday night to ask the audience's indulgence for a fifteen minutes' wait, one almost expected him to say," The star is indisposed."

"If you never met her, how did you know she was a bore?"
"I heard she was a novelist."

An Art Criticism

One of the finest collections of paintings ever exhibited by William Keith hangs at the present moment in Vickery's gallery. They are various, too, ranging from charming light clear things to fine dark forest oaks in Keith's best style, and to rich golden skies with flocks of sombre sheep in what Keith calls his "old master" manner. I was amused the other day to hear a parvenu discuss these pictures.

"Oh, I would not care to own one," said one nouvelle riche to another. "They are none of them real places. He makes up the pictures in his studio."

According to this criticism the reporter, who merely describes, is your true literary artist—the man who depends on his imagination for his contributions to literature is not to be ranked with the chronicler of current events.

Amedee Joullin has a beautiful picture on exhibition at the Bohemian Club. He will leave for Paris next month, to start studying again, for Joullin thinks one is never too old to learn something new.

San Francisco has long enjoyed the reputation of being one of the most critical and discerning cities in the United States and never has that reputation been more fully vindicated than in the instant appreciation of one of France's most famous champagnes, i. e., Ayala. For the merry and belated individual who treads the primrose path and who sometimes indulges not wisely but too well, the following morn has been bereft of all its terrors in the shape of remorseful headaches so often the aftermath of artificially sweetened champagnes. Of course as in other countries the stamp of approval has been set by the traveled and cultured classes of the Haut Ton.

Sandona Likes Honolulu

I hear that Matteo Sandona is very popular in Honolulu, where he is being made much of socially. As he is a handsome youth, with the dreamy eyes and dulcet speech of his people of Verona, it is quite natural that women should wish to lionize him. He has painted portraits of Prince and Princess David, Mrs. Sam Parker, Miss Campbell and of the baby Prince, and Dr. McGrew is now sitting for his picture. Princess David has issued invitations for a private exhibition of the Sandona portraits, to be given at her residence. The artist will remain in Honolulu indefinitely.

Among the Upper Thirteen

The chrysanthemum show last week in San Rafael was tactfully piloted to success by a little band of the elect headed by Mrs. Willie Babcock, and including the George Pages, the Pinckards, the George Davis Boyds, and the Truxtun Beales. Christine Pomeroy, who makes her debut today, went over as the guest of the Babcocks and added very materially to the funds of the Good Government Club, for the benefit of which the entertainment was given, by selling little boutonnieres and delivering with each a little hot air. Miss Pomeroy has a brilliant wit, an inheritance, by the way, from Pomeroy pere's side of the house. The budding geniuses of the village contributed to the gayety of the occasion. Wilberforce Williams and the Jones boys pieced out a mandolin sextet. Mr. Williams towers into the air some inches over six feet, and he handles the mandolin with more force than grace. He prides himself on being able to keep excellent time. It was not the entertainment, however, which attracted the throng. It had been announced that the oil and water of San Rafael society would mix and all the village turned out to witness the phenomenon. All they saw was a mere rubbing of elbows of the Improvement Club, which draws its membership from all classes irrespective of the rigid lines which the Upper Thirteen has drawn. Mrs. Babcock and her aides saw to it that the dignity of no Grande Dame was damaged.

Silas Palmer's Partner

Silas Palmer and Douglas McBryde are going to build a bungalow somewhere above Marysville, for the nature of their work as stone contractors requires their presence frequently in that section. Mrs. Palmer is already planning house parties, but only those who are agreeable guests under roughing-it conditions will be invited. Mr. McBryde and Mr. Palmer became great friends when the Palmers were in Honolulu on their wedding trip. The former has been here only a month, but intends to make this city his home. He will take apartments for himself and baby daughter, and is also talking of building at Menlo.

Moraghan-Knorp

The marriage of Miss Elsie L. Moraghan and Dr. Francis Frederick Knorp, on Wednesday, at three o'clock, in St. Mary's Cathedral, was very largely attended. The bride, who looked very charming in her white cloth costume with white picture hat, was attended by her sister, Miss Eugenie Moraghan, whose frock was of white crepe de chine trimmed with ermine. The bridegroom was attended by Mr. George Knorp. Rev. Father Coyle performed the ceremony, after which there was a reception at the home of the bride's parents. The bride is a daughter of the late W. B. Moraghan, one of our most successful business men. Dr. Knorp, though a young physician, has already won distinction in his profession. At present he occupies a chair in one of the medical colleges.

That San Jose Feud

The old feud between the Ruckers and the Lions, two of the most prominent families in San Jose, has again broken out. These two families have been rivals in business and in politics for years, and this rivalry has been the cause of many a sensational clash. The present trouble arose out of the resignation of George P. Snell from the management of the Hotel Vendome. Joseph H. Rucker, who is treasurer of the Vendome company, desires to succeed Snell, but the Lions, who are heavy stockholders in the company, object. Rucker declares that he is going to assume charge of affairs at the hotel until the directors choose a successor to Mr. Snell, claiming that to be his right as treasurer of the company. Both factions are determined and there may be some very warm times among the hotel directors before the controversy is ended, as both factions have a strong following in the board. At the last annual meeting of the stockholders the Lions opposed the re-election of Rucker as treasurer, and the fight became so bitter that a police officer was called in to preserve the peace.

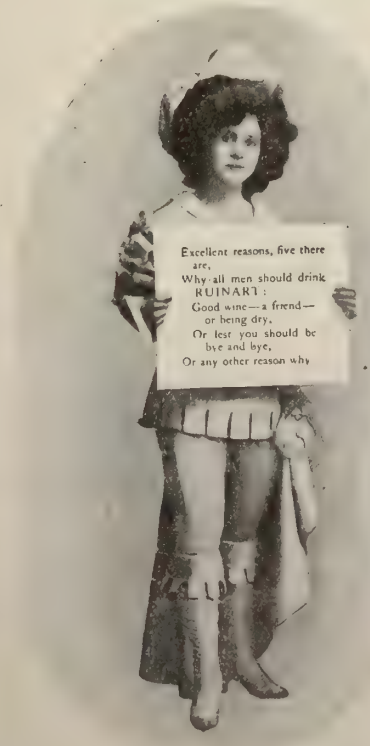
They Objected to the Bride



That the Hush brothers came to blows over the marriage of the older boy with Miss Talbott is not surprising to those who have known the way the family received the marriage. Mrs. Hush was prostrated for a week, I understand, and announced from the start that she would never see her son again unless he left his bride. The father dismissed his son from his office directly he heard of the marriage, but the young people have been getting on fairly well in their own way. I believe that one of the strongest objections to the marriage is that the bride is several years older than her husband.

Bowles and the Trust

The unexpected resignation, this week, of Rear-Admiral Francis T. Bowles, Chief Constructor of the United States Navy, was significant and startling. I cannot help associating it with the exposures in connection with the collapse of the United States Shipbuilding Company. Bowles was the youngest Admiral the United States ever had, and he was chief of his corps with the prospect before him of being paid even when old age should necessitate his retirement. And yet he has resigned. Unfortunately his resignation was sent in just as the scandal broke over the ship-building trust to which he was known to be friendly. Indeed I have seen official reports by Bowles, in which he made glowing claims for the properties concerned in the trust. To what extent his favor was connivance and to what extent due to misinformation, would be interesting to know.

It Is Really On, Says Dame Rumor

A curious result of the premature announcement that Susie Blanding and Knox Maddox were engaged is that, according to rumor, it actually brought about the engagement of the young people. At the time of the announcement Miss Blanding was very much embarrassed, but not more so than Mr. Maddox, for no engagement existed. It is said that Blanding pere went into a conniption fit over the report. When all the blushes had subsided Mr. Maddox resumed his attentions. And now the gossips have it that there is a sure enough engagement.

A Coincidence, Perhaps

Burlingame—the refuge of the anglo-maniac—resembles of late the forlorn beauty of the "Deserted Village," and yet a certain dyed-in-the-wool young Britisher has been busy with the menu, and a list of last season's buds. The Club porch was the chosen field of entertainment, and many are wondering if Cupid was an uninvited guest, and if it was a mere coincidence, or a deep design, that placed the same maiden, on two different occasions, on the host's right hand. The damsel must possess her soul in patience, for the native born thinks twice before choosing him a wife, and sticks more religiously to the old precedent than the grafter does to his broad "A."

The Dingees are Going

The William J. Dingees are soon to leave town for a tour through Europe and expect to be away four or five years. This announcement will surprise many people, but not more so than the report that they are going to sell their superb mansion at the northeast corner of Franklin and Washington streets, upon the interior of which has been spent a fortune. There is perhaps no handsomer interior finish in any residence in this city. I know their home is to be sold for they have instructed their agents, A. J. Rich & Co., to dispose of it at private sale. The lot is one hundred and thirty feet on Washington by one hundred and seventy on Franklin.

No Use to Her

The practice is growing among our fashionables, and also among those who like to be comfortable and keep their servants, of having something very nearly akin to a servants' hall, such as they have in England, with sitting-room, bathroom, clothes' closets and and bedrooms for the help, distinct from the rest of the house. Most of the new houses have the quarters for domestics arranged in this way. The mistress of a certain San Francisco household, when engaging a new Scandinavian maid the other day, showed her the bathroom and said, in triumphant tones, "This is your bathroom—all for yourself."

The girl looked at her open-mouthed. "But," she expostulated, "I never wash in cold wedder."

In Financial Circles

The week's business in the Stock and Bond Exchange has once more been disappointing. Transactions aggregated $62,000 in bonds, and 2759 shares, divided into 1125 shares Gas and Electric, 317 shares San Francisco Company, 392 shares miscellaneous and 900 shares sugar stocks.

Gas Electric has been decidedly strong. The bidding for the stock has been guarded, but determined and higher prices are looked for. The bonds of the company will be issued shortly.

Mutual Electric has developed some strength. There appears to be somebody picking up all that is offered without creating any urgent demand. A former director of the Gas and Electric company is occasionally mentioned as being the purchaser, but this is mere conjecture.

California Wine Association sold down to 92 1-2 on rumors of a falling off of business which met with prompt denial. The price recovered to 94.

Sugar shares have been rather firm. The crop reports are highly flattering and dividends on most of them are now in the air.

The sensational expose in New York of the manipulation of several industrial enterprises has had no effect on the local market. The Eastern gambling fad is dying out in this city, and investors are returning to the local market, where there is no fleecing process to await them.

The Gas and Electric company will probably declare a two-dollar dividend in December, to be followed by a quarterly dividend of one and one-fourth per share. The Financier.

John J. Greif

The Republican candidate for County Clerk, did not seek the nomination. It was given to him at the solicitation of prominent members of the bar who urged that the office be placed in charge of a man whose record for integrity was such that there could be no doubt that he would perform his duties conscientiously and in the interest of the people. They had confidence in Greif because they had come in contact with him through repeated administrations.

Judge Bahrs

The fight that Judge Bahrs has been making for Assessor is of the whirlwind order, and judging from recent developments he has occasioned great alarm in the camp of his opponent. When on the bench Judge Bahrs incurred the displeasure of some of the big corporations by his decisions.

Henry Lynch's Affection for His Men

A Big Heart His Leading Characteristic — Touching Story of His Tender Nature and Generous Impulses

(From the Evening Bulletin, October 21.)

Henry H. Lynch, the Republican candidate for Sheriff, is an interesting character. He came to California from Wisconsin when a boy of 16, and at first worked at the carpenter's trade. Later on he went into the planing-mill business and his hands still bear the scars of several encounters with the knives and saws of this establishment. About 1875 he entered the employ of General Thomas H. Williams, father of "Tom" Williams, the California Jockey Club magnate. General Williams set him to reclaiming his Sacramento river marshes, and while so engaged Lynch became an expert dredging engineer. After the death of Williams he went to Panama with the late H. B. Slaven and for two or three years carried on dredging operations under Panama canal contracts awarded by the De Lesseps Company.

On his return to this city, about 1884, Mr. Lynch, backed by Thomas Magee, W. H. Martin, John Ballard and others, obtained a franchise from the Board of Supervisors, under which he built the Powell-street cable railway system. Upon the completion of that road he became its superintendent and general manager. He continued in this position until the consolidation with the Market-street company's system; then he was appointed superintendent of construction of all the roads owned by that corporation—a position he has since filled and now fills under the United Railroads Company.

As chief engineer of the principal street-car system of San Francisco, Mr. Lynch has built all the extensions of the Market-street Company, including the San Mateo line, and has thus acquired a national reputation as a constructor of urban railways. For years he has been the largest employer of labor in San Francisco, and the fact that he is universally loved and respected by all his employes proves that he is a just, sympathetic and upright man.

During the strike on the Sutter-street car line many years ago he gave several of the strikers work on the Powell-street road. In fact, there are men employed on the Powell-street line today who were put there by Mr. Lynch during the strike. He has never had a dispute with his men about hours or wages. Having worked with his hands all his life, his heart and sympathies are invariably with the toilers.

Mr. Lynch's predominant characteristic is his sympathetic nature. As one of his admirers said the other day: "Henry Lynch has spent the greater portion of his time for twenty years hunting jobs for poor devils out of work. His heart is so big that I wonder he can carry it around. He has earned two or three fortunes and has given them away. He stakes his sick friends, hires doctors for them, takes care of their families, and when they recover provides them with work. A nobler, more sympathetic, more generous fellow don't live than Henry Lynch.

"I remember," this gentleman continued, "a single instance of his generosity which is only one of a thousand. While he was building the Powell-street road out near the Presidio one of his laborers fell by the wayside. This man had a large family. His name was Kelly and he lived somewhere down on Tar Flat. Lynch was busy those days and he did not miss Kelly from among his hundreds of employes until one windy, blustering afternoon in winter, when, covered with dirt, he was laying track on Jackson-street hills, a ragged little girl about six years old, weeping with cold, accosted him.

"The child was half-clad, blue and nearly frozen. She was Kelly's oldest girl. She had walked three miles in the driving wind to see Lynch. She told him, between chatters, that her papa was sick, and that her mother and brothers and sisters, having gone the limit at the grocery store and butcher shop, were getting perilously near starvation. For three days none of them had had a meal. What did Lynch say to her? Did he tell her to go away and not bother him, as most busy men situated as he was would have done? Not much. 'The devil!' said Lynch; 'this won't do.' He quit work, wrapped the child in his overcoat, got into his buggy and drove her home. He did this just as a matter of course and without thinking.

"The Kelly family had something to eat that night, you bet; a doctor was employed and the trouble was over. Lynch put Kelly back on the payroll and paid him his wages for eight weeks, though he didn't do a stroke of work the whole time. That little girl is a woman now and has children of her own. Maybe you think the whole family ain't out hunting for votes for Henry Lynch.

"Lynch has been doing this sort of thing all his life, and you can find hundreds of men all over San Francisco who will knock you down if you say a word against him. If he is elected Sheriff I predict that he will put in his time signing petitions for pardons for the miserable devils he is compelled to lock up and paying the rent of the poor families the courts order him to evict. He spends all his money that way now and he is too old to change. In fact he has the largest private pension roll of any man in San Francisco today.

"But it don't make any difference whether he is elected Sheriff or not. God will take care of him. A noble fellow like that is sure to prosper, and when he dies he will take his seat in heaven along with the angels, and don't you forget it."

GEORGE P. SNELL

The Pacific Improvement Company has at last secured a man to manage the Hotel Del Monte who will undoubtedly prove the right man in the right place. George P. Snell is one of the most widely known and experienced hotel men on the Coast, and there is probably not another who enjoys to the extent that he does the respect and good will of the people who are accustomed to periodical wanderings from the city for diversion. Manager Shepard of the Pacific Improvement Company is deserving of congratulation for having made the deal by which Mr. Snell shifts his services from the Vendome to the Del Monte. It was Snell who put the Vendome on a paying basis, and he may be depended upon to increase the popularity of the already popular Monterey resort.

The Fall of a Modern Jeems Yellowplush

To the Marquis d'Angleneuve at the Chateau de la Chesnaye par Thourotte (Oise).

Geneva, Sept. 8, 1902.

Monsieur le Marquis.

You will undoubtedly be surprised to receive a letter from your old Jean, the devoted valet, whom you dismissed after twenty years of loyal service. I do not deny, Monsieur, that my dismissal was without cause. Probably in your place, I should have done the same; however, if you will kindly permit, I will explain fully the circumstances which caused me to act as I did. The explanation may extenuate my fault, and possibly prove that I was not entirely wrong.

To begin with—for the first time, since entering your service, you took me with you to Bax-les-Bains, instead of leaving me at the chateau, as you had always done during the preceding years. As an excuse for making the change, you said that you had been badly waited upon at Bax, during the previous summer. You moreover declared that there was not a servant at the Grand Hotel who understood the delicate art of polishing tan shoes, and giving them the correct lustre; and though deeply regretting the loss of my annual month of holiday, I bowed submissively to your wishes.

Indeed, the reason alleged for my accompanying you was too important, I may add, too flattering to me, to be resisted, and though I do not wish to boast, I think that I can truthfully say that there are few servants who understand, as I do, the delicate art of polishing tan shoes. I therefore obeyed your commands, sir, and without a murmur followed you to the perditious city of Bax.

Here I had absolutely nothing to do—except to take care of your wardrobe and to assist you in making your toilet—a daily affair of an hour and a half, after which I was free to do as I pleased until the following morning.

Idleness has ever been an evil counselor—at least, sir, it proved so in my case.

To amuse myself, I wandered aimlessly through the streets and promenades of the city—this gay metropolis, scarcely larger than the kitchen garden at Chesnaye, and despite my studied efforts to avoid you, we frequently met.

Pardon the acknowledgment, Monsieur le Marquis, but in your white flannel suits, colored striped shirts, and rose cravats—your head capped with a natty sailor, adorned with a sporty blue ribbon, a style of dress, I must confess, a trifle too youthful for a man of your years, you no longer appeared to me under the austere aspect in which I had always been accustomed to regard you at Chesnaye—in a word, you whom I have never known except as a correct husband, faithful to Madame la Marquise, I now saw constantly promenading arm-in-arm in the English fashion, with Mademoiselle Marguerite Clapier.

To be just, I will admit that Mademoiselle is unquestionably a very pretty girl, a dashing brunette, whose passionate green eyes, veiled in long silken lashes, whose bewitching smile, adorably coquettish, might easily have captivated a much younger man. With her tall, svelte figure, admirably set off by fetching gowns of foulard, surah and embroidered muslin, she certainly appeared the ideal type of a temptingly pretty summer girl. But oh! what a difference there is between her and Madame la Marquise.

Madame has undoubtedly a much grander air, and in point of distinction the two women are not to be compared; however Madame is not so youthful, her figure is not so well rounded—in a word, I understood perfectly well—oh! believe me, perfectly well—that Monsieur preferred Mademoiselle Marguerite Clapier to Madame la Marquise.

The discovery startled me. It was not without its effect. Little by little, you forfeited my respect.

These are the gentlemen, our masters, said I to myself, who preach to us virtue, honesty and morality! Behold their example! For the first time I understood the Revolution of '89, and the message of Mirabeau, the King's chamberlain: "Go, tell your master, that with the virtues exacted from servants, that few masters would be worthy of being valets!"

Well—after this discovery, sir, what could you expect?

One fine day, when I knew that you were taking a shower-bath, I boldly decided to enter the Club.

"Your card, monsieur," said the servant at the door.

Remembering that I had a most decidedly English air, I replied gravely: "Lord Thourotte."

The lackey bowed to the ground, and I passed on to the gambling hall.

Ah, sir! what emotions I experienced on entering this room.

Seated before a table on a very high chair, I saw a solemn-looking individual, and directly opposite to him a servant with a sweeping moustache, who constantly repeated:

"Place your stakes, gentlemen, before the cards are dealt. The stakes are made. The game is closed."

The solemn individual then dealt the cards, and when he had finished, his long moustached employe swept before him, with his palette, the plaques, the louis and bank-notes.

Never in all my life, sir, had I seen such heaps of gold. I began to reflect. To gain that much money, I should be obliged to polish Monsieur le Marquis's tan shoes for years and years to come, and even then I could not be sure of saving so large a sum.

This reflection prompted me to watch closely the actions of the gentleman whom they called the banker. I observed that his work was neither difficult nor fatiguing. He dealt a card to the right, a card to the left, and drew one for himself. Twice he repeated this little exercise and the round was made. His employe had then nothing to do but rake in the money for him, and he to pocket it, after which he arose from his chair, demanding a wooden bowl to carry off his winnings, while the moustached employe cried: "Gentlemen, the bank is for sale! Who will stake ten louis?"

"I will!" I shouted, and rushed towards the arm-chair. The other players around the table laughed, as I spoke, for what reason, I do not know. One gentleman screamed at me, "Banco!" This was undoubtedly considered an insult, for it cost him a penalty of ten louis, which served to increase my little hoard.

I began to do precisely as I had observed the banker do. I dealt the cards, and the croupier, my partner, raked the money in. At times there was a lull in the game; and without doubt to calm the players, the employe allowed them to make a few insignificant winnings. The rakage, however, soon began again, and my little pile visibly increased. The game was a veritable contest. Gold rained upon the green cloth.

"Who is the gentleman?" I heard some one ask.

A voice whispered: "Lord Thourotte, a wealthy Englishman. I hunted grouse with him on his estate last winter."

Ah, Monsieur le Marquis, what lying braggarts there are in the smart set!

Flushed with triumph, the man's lie increased my vanity and ambition. I had already won eleven thousand francs—think of it, sir! eleven thousand francs! And there were still at least five thousand francs on every spot!

At this critical moment you entered the room, and without noticing the banker, seated above the three rows of players circling the table, you cried: "Five louis!" which you threw on the right spot.

I at once recognized your voice, and not caring to enter into a contest with you I answered humorously: "No! no! The game is closed, no more stakes will be received."

You in turn recognized my voice, and wounded by the response you cried: "You are right, Monsieur Jean, no more stakes will be received, for I shall kick you out of the door."

Then followed an uproar, an indescribable tumult.

Without waiting to be kicked out I profited by the confusion and escaped into the park with my eleven thousand francs. Never in all my life had I possessed so much money. I fancied that I had been suddenly metamorphosed into a de Rothschild; swelled with pride, I saw myself great and rich—a real Lord Thourotte, and I began to dream of accomplishing wonderful things.

At this moment, I had the misfortune to meet, near the fountain, Mademoiselle Marguerite Clapier. She appeared to be sad, and addressed me, saying: "You seem to be in trouble, my Lord." Hesitating a moment, she added: "You are the cause of my losing the society of Monsieur le Marquis, who has just entered the Club."

By a sudden intuition, I conceived an extraordinary stroke of folly. To revenge myself on you, I determined to carry off Mademoiselle Clapier.

A most unfortunate determination for me, yet believe me, Monsieur le Marquis, there are moments in our lives when we cannot prevent ourselves from doing the silliest and most foolish things.

The lovely creature did not have to be coaxed. She was ready and willing to accompany me.

In a moment of confidence, she said coquettishly: "Monsieur le Marquis always lavished money upon me, and gratified my every whim, whenever he had been particularly successful at the club. I hope some one else will follow his example."

I took the hint. We left that night for Geneva, traveling in a luxurious coach. My misfortune then began.

Ah, that Marguerite Clapier! What a woman she is! What a torpedo!

Disgusted with myself for having abandoned so good a master for the paltry sum of eleven thousand francs, and an animated shooting-cracker, I now humbly beg to be taken back into your service—and trust that Monsieur will not allow a slip of a girl, a bright-eyed spitfire, who would follow His Satanic Majesty to the end of the world, if he had the price—to separate him from a faithful servant.

Confused and penitent, I will admit that the eleven thousand francs lasted barely eight days, and that Mademoiselle Clapier, after expressing her utmost contempt for me, took her departure as soon as she discovered that I was without funds.

Today, completely disillusioned with the vanities of the world, and the half-world, I beg humbly to be again taken into your service.

Remember, Monsieur le Marquis, that I have served you faithfully for twenty years, that I understand all your little ways and mannerisms, that I am familiar with your habits, and am an expert depilatator of gray hair; while you yourself acknowledge that there is no one who understands, as well as I do, the delicate art of polishing tan shoes, and giving to them the correct lustre.

With profound respect, I am

Your faithful servant, Jean Buisson.

The Stage

Affairs in General

Theatre-goers could find very little to enthuse over this week. There was a dearth of attractions worth while, and consequently people who attended political meetings felt that they suffered no great loss. The last week of a political campaign is always a dull one and this was no exception. If it were not for the arrival of the Metropolitan Opera Company orchestra and Madame Nordica this would have gone down in theatrical history as one of the dullest weeks of several seasons. However, there are some good things coming and one of them is "Ben Hur." While we are suffering from a dearth of theatrical pabulum, New York is getting a large supply of new things. The season has opened auspiciously in New York, and several new plays have met with success. We shall probably see them in the next year or two for all things come to those who wait. John Drew, who usually comes this way, has a new play called "Captain Dieppe," which is a most satisfactory vehicle for the popular comedian. The big extravaganza of the season is "Babey in Toyland." A dramatization of "Checkers" has scored and "The Three Little Maids" musical production from London is as big a hit as was "Florodora" when it crossed the ocean. Last week Ethel Barrymore made her appearance in "Cousin Kate," a comedy written by Hubert Henry Davies, formerly of this city, and it scored an emphatic hit.

George Osbourne's Cardinal

When George Osbourne played the butler in "Lady Huntworth's Experiment" I thought it should be written down as the greatest achievement among his many brilliant interpretations of stage characters. But his Cardinal Richelieu in "Under the Red Robe" is such a remarkably fine thing that even the butler—and 'tis a far cry between a butler and a cardinal—pales in comparison. That was all comedy, delightfully unctuous comedy: this is all power, vigor and dignity. It is doubtful if the character ever had a finer exponent. "Under the Red Robe" is not new to us. It has had other presentations in this city, but it is a good melodrama of the swashbuckling order and is always interesting. Miss Block as Rene de Cocheforet is a regal and beautiful figure. Mr. Durkin is a dashing and lovable Gil de Berault and Miss Starr and Mr. Maher are effective in the lesser roles. Walter Belasco, whose old sexton in "Lady Bountiful" was such a fine bit of character work, is again well cast as Clon.

Uncle Tom Up to Date

Some time since the Daughters of the Confederacy in a Southern city made vigorous protest against keeping "Uncle Tom's Cabin" any longer in the public eye, by stage representations. There was a deal of pro and con talk about it but Uncle Tom still walks the boards. The dramatic profession would feel itself devoid of a picturesque feature if the "Tommers" were banished. The Central has revived the old play in sumptuous style this week. There are more than a score of beautiful scenes and some clever specialties are introduced in the plantation scenes. Myrtle Vane makes a great hit as Topsy, and revives memories of famous Topsies one has seen from Maggie Mitchell on. Stockwell has given his Marks, the lawyer, many times to San Francisco audiences, but it never grows stale. He is as funny as ever in the donkey stunt. Margaret Leavy as Aunt 'Phely is one of the best in the cast, which contains all the strength of the company. Many tears are shed over little Eva, who is very realistically acted by Baby Marine.

At the Orpheum

Goleman's trained dogs and cats are quite the most wonderful animals seen at the Orpheum in a long time. The domestic cat is possibly the slowest of all animals in learning tricks, and it must have taken the patience of Job to have taught these the wonderful tricks they perform so well. The best feature of their stunt is their wonderful leaping. Tom Browne gives a delightful whistling specialty that seems to take with the house immensely. Mr. Browne made himself famous in "A Trip to Chinatown," where he was known as "Whistling Tom." The act by McWatters and Tyson is an amusing skit. In it Miss Tyson gives one of the cleverest imitations of Marie Dressler I have ever seen. Crawford and Manning have a knockabout performance that made the gallery gods hilarious on Tuesday night. Other clever performers are Wenona and Frank, rifle shots, Herbert Lloyd, the "King's Jester," and the three Richards, acrobats.

In a Verdi Opera

Those merry singers from sunny Italy continue to draw enthusiastic music lovers to the Tivoli. This week they appeared in "Un Ballo Maschera," and the cast was a strong one including as it did Gregoretti, Agostini, Benedetto, Marchesini and Tromben. It requires a strong cast to do justice to this opera, and the Tivoli singers gave general satisfaction. Gregoretti's fine baritone was heard to special advantage, and though the dramatic intensity of the opera appeared to be somewhat of a strain on Agostini he handled himself with rare art, and his dulcet tones were never forced. Benedetto was full of dramatic fire, and entered well into the spirit of her part. It was a well-rounded performance, and some of the scenes were given with brilliant coloring.

One of the Old Guard

Leslie Morosco's appearance at the Grand this week was a reminder of old times, of the days and nights when the villain still pursued her, and the gallery yelled itself hoarse over the hero's wonderful achievement. Young Mr. Morosco is now living down his melodramatic past in farce-comedy, but if he stays with "Spotless Town" he will have other sins to repent.

The Ballad of Despair

The most fashionable audience that has assembled in a local theatre for many a moon was that which gathered in the Alcazar last Friday afternoon. Though Beranger's "Ballad of Despair" was announced as the piece de resistance of the affair, the first part of the program was given up to a program of songs by Mrs. Lillie Birmingham, and some charming violin solos by Wenzel Kopta. Mrs. Birmingham looked beautiful in a pink frock and hat, and she received a great many flowers at the conclusion of her first number. The interpretation of the Beranger poem, which came later, took but a few minutes, but during its brief recital the audience was interested to the intensity point. We had "Everyman" to prepare us for the Ballad, else perhaps it would not have been so well appreciated as it was. It is an exquisite thing and received exquisite interpretation by Florence Roberts, who enacted the part of the despairing Poet; Mrs. Birmingham, the Voice, and the Angel of Death in the end; Miss Moroney, at the piano; Mr. Kopta, violin, and Theodore Mansfeldt, 'cello.

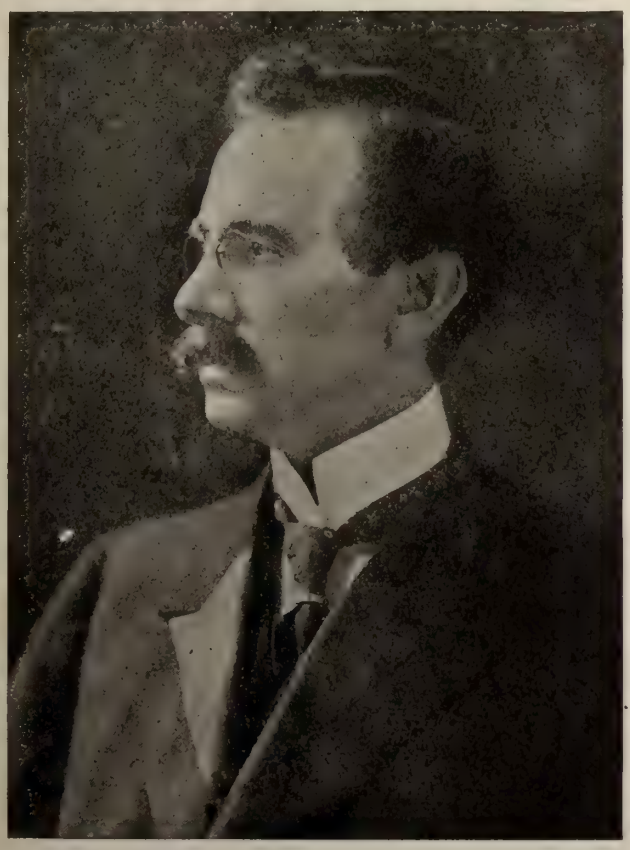
JOHN B. MAHER

A comedian who depends upon artistic method, rather than on peculiar personality or tricks of mannerism, is John B. Maher, who came into instant popularity at the Alcazar. He has shown great versatility thus far, and will find ample opportunity in the comedy bills of November, in such plays as "Too Much Johnson" and "The Private Secretary." Mr. Maher was identified with many of William Collier's earlier farcical successes, and was a great favorite in Cincinnati for five years, as comedian of the famous Pike stock company.

GRACE TYSON

The singing comedienne, who made a hit at the Orpheum this week in "Scenes In a Dressing Room."

A Boundary Question at Fischer's



The amusing and odd feature of "Rubes and Roses," which will have its premier at Fischer's on Monday night, is that in the second act the stage is divided in two states, Indiana and Illinois. This idea grew out of an actual fact. Hammond, Indiana, a city situated about twenty miles from Chicago, is partly in Illinois. On the state line dividing Indiana and Illinois, a German has a general store, half of which is in Illinois and half in Indiana. To dodge the law, the wily German moves his bar on wheels every Sunday morning over on the Illinois side of the store and dispenses liquor which is consumed on the Indiana side. It takes more than a day for the law to act and by the time the authorities can serve papers, the bar is shoved back into Indiana. "Rubes and Roses" weaves a plot concerning two farms, one in Indiana and the other in Illinois, each owned by a German who dares not cross the line because an officer stands on each side of the line with warrants. They can come up to the state line but the moment a hand or foot is over the mark there is trouble. The shrewd attorney in the play, a part fitted to Barney Bernard, in one situation places one foot in Indiana and the other in Illinois and defies the law, because he claims any person is secure from the law when standing in two states at the same time.

"Erminie" has been revived in New York with Francis Wilson as the star of the cast. Francis was in the original "Erminie" cast when it was produced at the Casino in New York, and that was when he made his first hit. William Broderick, well known to local theatre-goers, Jessie Bartlett Davis, and Signor Perugini, who was one of Lillian Russell's husbands, are also in the company.

It is exasperating enough to know that we live thousands of miles away from things musical without having the fact emphasized as it was at the "Pop" concert of the Metropolitan theatre orchestra last Wednesday afternoon. Despite our remoteness from the musical centre we have learned to appreciate compositions of a higher order than many of those that interspersed the "Pop" program. Such trite, commonplace pieces as "Le Secret" and "Loin du Bal" which are usually heard at pupils' recitals, are hardly worth while on a pleasant afternoon when the sun and air are refreshing, even though they are played by a high class musical organization. Not only was the instrumental offering tame but the vocal soloist was scarcely up to the standard one should expect in a woman acting as an alternate for the great Nordica. Katherine Fisk has a pleasing voice but she is not a great artist. The opening concert of the company is discussed in the musical department.

A recital will be given next Friday evening by the pupils of Mrs. Grace Davis Northrup and Alexander T. Stewart in Steinway hall. Miss Lavilla Bilger, a pupil of Otto Bendix, will also take part in the program.

The manifestations of psychic power being given every Sunday evening at Steinway hall by Dr. Alex. J. McIvor-Tyndall are startling enough to be designated as supernatural. There have been various attempts at times to explain the phenomena of thought-transference so wonderfully demonstrated by Tyndall on a strictly physiological basis, such as the action of the brain cells in transmitting ideas and impressions. This, however, seems to be wholly insufficient to account for the marvels enacted by the famous telepathist. Whatever be the hypothesis upon which these phenomena are produced, there can be but one opinion regarding the interesting phase of them. In his lecture last Sunday night on "The World Invisible," Tyndall stated it as his conviction that there is a world invisible, impalpable but nevertheless real, about us, and within elbow reach, as it were. Tomorrow night the lecture will be "Spiritualism": The Sunday following, November eighth, the subject will be "Hypnotism and Crime." Each lecture will be followed by demonstrations of psychic power.

JOHN MORRISEY

The genial manager of the Orpheum has occupied that position ever since the theatre was opened as a high-class vaudeville house. Few men have had greater experience in the vaudeville business, and few are so competent to judge of the merit of a performer who has a reputation to achieve.

Features of Next Week's Bills

The advance sale of seats for "Ben Hur" is the largest in the history of drama in San Francisco. There has been a continuous line before the Grand Opera House box office since last Thursday. Seats for the first two weeks of the engagement are now on sale and are being taken up with great rapidity. The company arrives from the East tomorrow, which will enable the members to indulge in a good rest prior to the Monday night performance. Mr. Joseph Brooks, who directed in conjunction with Mr. A. L. Erlanger the original staging of the play at the Broadway theatre, New York city, arrived in the city last Monday and has taken complete charge of everything. Special attention is called to the fact that the curtain for the evening performances of "Ben Hur" rises precisely at eight o'clock and at two o'clock for the matinees. The performance starts without any overture and discloses in the prelude the appearance of the "Star of Bethlehem" to the Three Wise Men in the desert. The scene is a very impressive one and necessitates a darkened auditorium. During it the management will not permit any one to be seated.

"The Storks," the Columbia attraction, had the longest run in Chicago of any play since the World's Fair. It is really a Western article in every particular. The Dearborn theatre of Chicago controls the venture, the authors, Frederick Chapin and Guy F. Steely, are Westerners, also Richard Carle (inasmuch as he pays taxes in Chicago, and intends to make the Windy City his permanent home), all the scenery and electrical embellishments were made by the Dearborn theatre stage staff, the costumes designed and made by the leading costuming establishments of the West, and ninety per cent of the seventy-five players are Westerners. The cast consists of Gus Weinberg, Gilbert Gregory, Francis Lieb, George Shiels, George Romain, Abbott Adams, George McKay, Anna Cole Youlin, Countess Von Hatzfelt, Ada Deaves, Dorothy Choate, Myra Davis and others.

An entirely original and novel musical comedy, with fun that keeps an audience in roars of laughter from the rise to the fall of the curtain, is what the management of Fischer's promises for its next attraction, on Monday night. The most extensive preparations have been going on the past month to make the musical comedy a magnificent one from a spectacular standpoint. The play had a long and successful run in Chicago last season and received the unanimous praise of the entire press of that city. "Rubes and Roses" has a very peculiar groundwork. The action takes place in Indiana, famous for a peculiar brand of "rubes." It is not one of the "Way Down East" type, but an amusing chain of situations, in which two Germans, wise farmers, are involved in difficulties that seemingly snow them under from time to time as the play progresses. Winfield Blake will be "Bud" Conalong, the hero; Maud Amber will be Miss Starring, a lady of wealth, who seeks fame by presenting property to one of the fashionable canoe clubs situated just outside of Chicago. In addition to the double cast of principals, the new musical comedy will mark the first appearance here of Georgia O'Ramey, a clever soubrette, and one of the best known American comedians, Ben T. Dillon, both of whom will have original specialties.

FRANK J. GRACE

When young men of the character of Frank J. Grace decide to enter upon a public career, the community has occasion to rejoice. The election of Mr. Grace to the Board of Supervisors would mean that the tax-payers of San Francisco had engaged the services of a man in whom they could have absolute confidence. Mr. Grace was born in this city and graduated from Columbia University, taking the degree of Civil Engineer. For eight years he has held the position of sub-manager of the local branch of W. R. Grace & Co., probably the largest house in America engaged in foreign trade. He has traveled extensively through Europe, and has familiarized himself with all that makes for progress in the development of a city. Imbued as he now is with a desire to participate in the upbuilding of this city, it is to be hoped that he will be encouraged. It is a healthful sign when young men of his character decide to take a hand in the management of municipal affairs. Mr. Grace is a son of J. W. Grace, an old resident of this city, who established the firm of J. W. Grace & Co., and he is a nephew of Hon. W. R. Grace, who was twice elected Mayor of New York.

Two years have elapsed since "Too Much Johnson" was given in this city. Two years have developed a new generation of playgoers, who will delight in the droll story of the Yonkers man, one of Gillette's most popular comedy heroes. At the Alcazar next week James Durkin will play the part of the monumental and versatile liar. John B. Maher will be the fiery French wine importer, and Fred J. Butler the irascible and truculent Johnson. Adele Block will be the confiding wife and Marie Howe the suspicious mother-in-law, with George Osbourne as Faddish of Quebec and Frances Starr as Leonora. The pictures of steamship and sugar plantation will be full of realistic life and color. Following will come "The Private Secretary."

The Central will follow its magnificent production of "Uncle Tom's Cabin" with the American comedy drama, "At Valley Forge." This play contains a thrilling story of patriotism and love, in "the times that tried men's souls." The plot is powerful, and every act is rich in historical pictures that are fascinating and inspiring. The cast will be an excellent one, and the scenery and costumes picturesque. "At Valley Forge" has made an immense hit in the East, and will be a strong drawing card at the Central next week.

The Tivoli has another attractive bill to offer next week in Donizetti's "La Favorita," which will alternate with the double bill of "Cavalleria" and "Pagliacci." "Favorita" has always been a drawing card with San Francisco audiences, and with the present strong company a fine presentation will undoubtedly be given. For "Cavalleria" and "Pagliacci," which are to be repeated in response to a general demand, the same casts as those of two weeks ago will be put on. Next week will be the tenth of the grand opera season and there will probably be three weeks more.

The "Village Choir," Charlotte Miller, soprano, Nellie Hart, contralto, Arthur Thrasher, tenor, and Glover Ware, basso, will sing for the first time in San Francisco at the Orpheum. Max Waldon, a European transformation artist and female impersonator, will reappear in this city after a long absence abroad. Clivette, "The Man in Black," who stands without an equal as a silhouettist, magician and juggler all rolled into one, will present his unique entertainment. The Two Roses, who come direct from New York with a dainty musical offering, promise an attractive musical novelty.

At the Chutes Lew Wells will amuse with his saxophone, the grotesque Morriseys will make their first appearance here, and the Allen sisters, formerly with the Nelson family, will present an extraordinary acrobatic act. John World and Mindel Kingston, the novel singers and dancers, will vary their specialty, Mathews and Hoff will change their ballads and instrumental selections, and Mabel Lamson will be heard in new illustrated songs.

Poe Dramatized in French

A one-act play which has met with success in England under the title "The Soothing System," and which arrived in London via Paris, where it was given as "Le Systeme du Docteur Goudron et du Professor Plume," turns out to be only the well-known story of Edgar Allen Poe, "The System of Dr. Tarr and Professor Fether." In time it will probably reach America and be as highly appreciated as other French importations.

Dickens's Em'ly

A dramatic version of "David Copperfield" under the title of "Em'ly' is about to be staged in England. There was a stage version of this novel produced in 1869, with the title "Little Em'ly." One rather wonders what will be done with Em'ly this time. In those benighted times when the story was written, the Little Em'lys were glad to hide their diminished heads and to live quiet lives in obscurity. They were believed to have forfeited the respect of their friends and acquaintances, and to be under the necessity of climbing into the light by slow and painful steps, but we know better now. The woman with a past has every career open to her. She may write novels, lecture before woman's clubs, go on the stage or marry a title. She has been exalted upon a pedestal and has become "a problem." Would a modern play "go" if the lines of Dickens's novel were followed? Would an audience be satisfied with a repentant sinner going out to the colonies with her humble old uncle, to live in the Australian bush, a life of obscure usefulness? The modern "Em'ly" would demand a taste of the flesh pots, and the modern audience would be pretty apt to demand a sight of gorgeous costumes and furnishings. Em'ly was in too big a hurry to repent, for modern notions. Now we will see what the dramatist has done for her.

The Latest from Clyde Fitch

Concerning Mr. Clyde Fitch's latest play, "Her Own Way," in which Maxine Elliott made her debut as a star in New York last week, a correspondent writes: "It shows that notwithstanding the strain on his typewriter in the last few years, he has made progress in his art. The play has some shortcomings, but its characters are human and some of them are new to the stage. As usual, his opening scene is a novelty. It is a nursery where four smart New York children are seated about a table discussing their relations. Miss Elliott scores in a tender and womanly way, and strikes a true note. One of the Fitchisms that caught the house on the opening night was the remark of one of the characters, a step-mother, when she contemplates a life of poverty. She says, 'Think of living in a flat where visitors rush into the bathroom when they think they are going out of the front door.'"

Sothern in the Limelight

E. H. Sothern is not content to be recognized as a great actor. He recently wrote a play for his wife, Virginia Harned, entitled "The Light That Lies in Woman's Eyes." It was a rank failure. The critics scored the play, and then Mr. Sothern denounced the critics. Last week Mr. Sothern appeared in Justin Huntley McCarthy's latest play, "Proud Prince," at Detroit, and the clergy of the town called on the Health authorities to put the drama in quarantine. They pronounced it a most lascivious play. It was produced last Monday night at the Herald Square in New York, and the house was sold out the day after the news was received from Detroit.

The Actress in Her Variety

The average stock actress is wildly and weirdly eccentric in her notions of dressing. We have seen a lank and lathy leading woman so grotesquely attired as to resemble an animated Maypole. Another, grown hippy and abdominal, has appeared in gowns suggestive of the masquerade ball outfitters and clinging to her matronly form with the seductive abandon of a meal sack tied in the middle. Still another resourcefully borrowed a ball gown from a chorus girl to lend fascination in a drama of swell society. And still another displayed to the startled public gaze a home-made scarlet hat which resembled the burning of a red barn, illumined by the glare of a blazing August sunset. It was an aurora borealis of confections; a belching Vesuvius of millinery. It is grateful to find women at the Alcazar who know how to select and wear their gowns. Juliet Crosby and Adele Belgarde have dressed in perfect taste. Adele Block and Frances Starr are newcomers who have chic, style, correct ideas and the air of polite society. Their gowning is rich, modish and quite up to date.

MUSIC

[Communications addressed to this department should be received not later than Wednesday noon.]

Nordica and Duss

Some leaders are more than half the orchestra but there are orchestras whose esprit de corps is sufficient to overcome the handicap of less than half a leader. The Metropolitan Opera House symphony orchestra is one of them. Far be it from me, however, to suggest that Mr. J. S. Duss is not endowed with all the parts and attributes of a man. Standing on the conductor's platform, baton in hand, rear elevation to the audience, he presents a fine figure of a man, but he is not an ideal conductor. He is probably imbued with the spirit of the composers he interprets, but he hasn't the knack of communicating it to the players. He doesn't magnetize them, and neither does he galvanize his audience. If there was anything lacking in the work of the Metropolitan orchestra Tuesday night, it was fire, the fire that leaders infuse into the performers. Mr. Duss is not volatile and he has not sufficient enthusiasm. However the work of the orchestra was smooth and it revealed the effect of training under some of the world's greatest leaders. The only piece in which they fell short of expectations was in Tschaikowsky's Overture Solemnelle, which was decidedly tame. The audience gave Lillian Nordica a hearty greeting, and went into ecstasies over her singing. Years of Wagner have put scarcely any rough edges on the tones of the great diva. Her rendition of the Elizabeth aria from "Tannhauser" was superb. She sang with as much dramatic intensity as though she were participating in the action of the opera. She responded generously to encores, and roused her audience to high enthusiasm by the artistry with which she handled some of the simpler numbers. Tuesday night's audience enjoyed a great musical treat, and testified its appreciation in thunders of applause. And large volumes of it were invoked by Nahan Franko, the violinist, in two solos that were as delightful as they were unexpected. Mr. Franko does not exhibit upon his person any of the familiar hall-marks of the wizard with the bow, but he revealed to the audience a delicacy of touch in the "Traumerei" that fairly set the people ablaze with enthusiasm.

MISS CLARA ALEXANDER

Who will give her farewell Dixie darky dialect recital in Lyric hall next Wednesday evening, under the patronage of society women. Miss Alexander will shortly leave for New York en route to London, where she is sure to be a great success.

The Spamer Concert

Mr. Otto Spamer, at his violin recital last week, did much to add to the favorable impression that he made as soloist at one of the symphony concerts under Fritz Scheel. Throughout the entire program, the applause he won was little short of an ovation. After the Wilhelmj "Polonaise," the audience insisted on having an encore, and the Chopin nocturne with which their enthusiastic insistence was rewarded gave them the violinist at his best. It was played with that delicacy that comes only through mastery. In the Wilhelmj numbers, as might be expected, Mr. Spamer was very much at home. The interpretation he had, of course, at first hand. However, in the "Romance" the feeling was, if I may so express it, a little fat. In the Paganini-Wilhelmj "Concerto" and in the 'Airs Russes" (Wieniawski), the work was exceedingly effective, but somewhat uneven; the bravura not quite intrepid enough. In fact, could the talented pupil of the great Wilhelmj but put a little more distinction into his broad tones, he would perhaps find his forte in andante movements. A Bach chaconne is a severe test of a player's ability. Mr. Spamer stood it admirably. Very artistically Mrs. Blanchard sang Massenet's "Pleurez, mes Yeux" and Brahms' "Ruhe, Sussliebchen." The other two numbers were not so well sung because not so happily chosen. To make praise keep time with Mr. Maurer's accompanying requires the pen of a readier writer.

Ellery's Royal Italian Band

The popular Ellery Royal Italian Band which played such a long season here last winter returns for a season of ten concerts, beginning tomorrow matinee, and every night until Monday the ninth. On Monday night the second no concert will be given, the theatre being engaged for that night. Matinees will be given on Saturday and Sundays. The prices will be popular, ranging from fifty cents to one dollar. Programs will be changed nightly and the ten great soloists of the organization will be heard in some fine numbers recently added to the repertoire. The new leader, Manfredo Chiaffarelli, is a composer of fine reputation and a number of his works will be played. The programs for the opening concerts Sunday afternoon and night are: Matinee—March, American Belle, Bentley, overture, "La Fanciulla," Secchi, Suite, l'Arlesienne, Bizet, selections from "Prince of Pilsen," Lueders, Love in Idleness, Macbeth, grand fantasie "Faust," Gounod. There is also a march by Chiaffarelli. The soloist will be Sig. Antonio Decimo,. the famous clarinetist. In the evening the overture to "Tannhauser" and the "Albumblatt" by Wagner, the sextet from "Poliuto," a grand potpourri from "La Boheme" and the fantasie from "Carmen" will be played. The special features will be a trumpet solo from "Mignon" played by Signor Palmaand and the quartet of saxophones in "Oh for the Wings of a Dove." These are as fine programs as can be offered by any organization in existence.

The Greven Operatic Recital

Next Friday evening the Greven Operatic School will give its sixth costumed operatic recital in Native Sons' hall. The first part of the program, devoted to comic opera, will be rendered by talented pupils who have studied with Mr. Greven a year or less, while the second part, grand opera, will be sung by a few of the advanced pupils. The San Francisco Conservatory orchestra under T. D. Herzog's leadership will assist. The operatic selections will include scenes from "Maritana," "Boccaccio," "The Mikado," "The Pirates of Penzance," "Robert le Diable," "Tannhauser," "Lucia," "La Nozzi di Figaro" and "Il Trovatore."

Mrs Herman Perlet, who as Belle Thorne was once the popular prima donna of the Tivoli, will sing the soprano part of her husband's First Mass, opus 5, at Holy Cross church tomorrow, Jubilee Sunday. Oddly enough this will be the first time Mrs. Perlet has sung the Mass, though she studied it while abroad this summer with Mr. Perlet. It is to be sung for the first time in this city. The choir of the church, of which Harry Wood Brown is organist, consists of Miss Sophia Rottanzi and Mrs. Brennan, sopranos; Miss B. Pegillion and Miss Marie Rottanzi, altos; Baptista Berona, tenor; and Marcel Perron, basso.

Miss Alexander's Farewell

Mrs. Fred Slavan, a new pianiste, and Willard Young, a new baritone, will assist in making Miss Clara Alexander's farewell Dixie darky dialect recital a success. The affair will be given next Wednesday evening in Lyric hall, and the patronesses include all the prominent society women. Mrs. Slavan will play Moszkowski's "Liebeswalzer," op. 57 No. 5, the Tschaikowsky Romance in F minor, and "The Maiden's Wish" (Chopin-Liszt). Miss Alexander's numbers will be "Ham Bascum of Juniper Georgia," "Lady" by Ruth McEnery Stuart, "Uncle Reuben's Baptism," a scene from that great novel of the year, "The Leopard's Spots," and "Dancin' Match." Mr. Young will sing H. Clough-Leiter's "Song of the Sword," Schubert's "The Linden Tree," "Come Where the Lindens Bloom" (Dudley Buck), "The Old Song" (Grieg) and "Far Away" by Shafter-Howard.

The forty-fourth concert of the Music Teachers' Association of California was given on Wednesday evening in Byron Mauzy hall, which was packed to the usual suffocation point of invitational affairs. The program rendered consisted of the following numbers: Piano, waltz, D flat maj. op. 64 No. 1, Chopin, Mary McAndrew; Prologue, "Pagliacci" (in costume), Leoncavallo, Master Mario Roeckel; Second Waltz, op. 56, B. Godard, Walter King; mandolin, Nocturne, op. 9 No. 2 in E flat, Chopin, Love Song, op. 275, mandolin solo, unaccompanied (dedicated to Mr. Adelstein), Carlo Munier, Samuel Adelstein; song, "The Island of Dreams," S. Adams, Miss Clara Praeffle; trio for piano, violin and 'cello, G major, John Haraden Pratt, Prof. Joseph Roeckel, Misses Mary and Dorothy Pasmore; Spinning and Jewel Scene, "Faust" (in costume), Gounod, Maria Roeckel; Variations in F minor, Haydn, Miss Hazel Wolfe; songs, Pastoral—La Tosca, Puccini, "Warum sind die Rosen so blass," Tschaikowsky, "Si mes vers avaient des ailes," Hahn, Miss Elena Roeckel; lute, "Melodie" in F, Rubinstein, "Canto de Amor," melodia, Alamgro Balsimelli (dedicated to Mr. Adelstein), Samuel Adelstein; song, "Welcome Pretty Primrose," Pinsuti, Miss Daisy Veaco. The officers of the Association are H. W. Patrick, president, A. Spadina, vice-president, Mrs. J. A. Whiteside, secretary, Mrs. P. O. Peterson, treasurer; directors, Paul Steindorff, Mme. Ellen Coursen-Roeckel, T. D. Herzog.

Frederic M. Biggerstaff, the pianist, will give a concert in Lyric hall next Friday evening, when he will be assisted by Mrs. Edward F. Schneider, mezzo soprano. The program will include some very fine numbers, Chopin being represented, with Brahms, Schumann, Arensky, Moszkowski, Rubinstein and others.

There was some delightful music rendered at the Papyrus Club's "special day" on Thursday of last week. Mrs. Fred A. Gardner sang an aria from "Rigoletto" and Liza Lehmann's "Making the Hay," and Frank Onslow, to Miss Helen Sutherland's accompaniment, sang Trotere' "Tyanita" and Blumenthal's "An Evening." Miss Jenne Morrow Long gave a monologue and W. Greer Harrison talked on "Women's Clubs." Miss Ella V. McCloskey arranged the program.

Twenty of the best musicians, indeed the creme de la creme of the professionals here, formed the orchestra that played at the Hopkins for the entertainment of the visiting bankers. Henry Heyman was congratulated more than once during the evening on the decided success of his orchestra. The "Tannhauser" overture scored one of the biggest hits with the bankers, though they also expressed delight at the concluding number, "Gilmore's "American National Airs."

Jacques Thibaud will be among the musical novelties in New York next month. He opens at Carnegie hall on November twentieth. Thibaud was termed by Ysaye one of the greatest living violinists. His trills are said to be marvelous.

The first concert of the 1903-1904 season of the Minetti Orchestra will be given at the Alhambra on the evening of December fourteenth. The weekly rehearsals are being held on Monday evenings at eight o'clock at the hall of the Century Club, 1215 Sutter street. The organization is a very creditable one and its prospects are extremely promising. —The Music Critic.

Automobile Topics

Next Friday is the opening day of the great automobile race meeting of the Automobile Club of California. The first race on the Ingleside track will take place at 1:30 p. m. There will undoubtedly be a large crowd to see the horseless carriages whizzing around the oval under the minute mark. Oldfield will in all probability be the centre of attraction. Barney Oldfield is the premier of all the automobile racing men in this country. He raced at Denver a few days ago and his cars are now en route to San Francisco by express.

The entries for the big meet close Monday. It is not yet known in what events the champion from the Atlantic coast will appear. He will no doubt enter his Baby Bullet in the fifth race on Friday, a contest of five miles for all cars eighteen hundred pounds and under. Oldfield will surely be a competitor in the seventh race, a ten-mile event for cars irrespective of power or weight. In this he will no doubt enter his eighty-horse power racing car known as the Bullet No. 2. It was rumored a week or so ago that Henry Cunningham, the great Detroit racer, would be here, but it is now said that he will not.

Among the big cars that are sure to be competitors in the race meet besides Oldfield's are the big Mercedes from Pasadena, Whittell's Mors, a Panhard, a White racing machine and a Franklin racer.

The National Automobile Company has received word that the Toledo which broke all world's records in the Eastern endurance run and which lost only eight minutes' time, was an ordinary two-cylinder Toledo, the exact duplicate of carriages kept in stock by the company. This performance is all the more remarkable when one considers that all the trains running from New York to Buffalo were from eighteen to twenty-four hours late, and that all Associated Press reports were delayed eight hours, the wires being down.

There is to be a parade of automobiles on Thursday, November fifth, immediately preceding the races at Ingleside. The White company has given an eighty-dollar cup to be awarded to the best decorated automobile. The award is to be made by the Board of Governors of the Automobile Club of California and some lively competiton is expected. This cup is of sufficient value to be worthy of any one's endeavor, and some beautifully decorated carriages ought to be seen in the parade.

Mr. F. A. Hyde, President of the Automobile Club of California, purchased a Winton touring car the early part of this season and, after using the same for touring through California, sold his machine a week ago for within one hundred and fifty dollars of the original price.

One of the most important transactions in the automobile trade in California occurred last week when the Mobile Carriage company took over the "Mobile" Company of America on the coast. Over a year ago some business men became interested in the automobile passenger business and placed several large "Mobiles" in the service. This proved profitable and the business was increased and incorporated as the Mobile Carriage Company of California. Recently this concern decided to go into all branches of the automobile business. While it will continue to handle the "Mobile" steam cars here, it will carry a large line of the gasoline cars. The passenger business will also be extended by the use of gasoline cars. Frank E. Hartigan, who built up the business for the "Mobile" Company of America in California, will be manager for the Mobile Carriage Company. The directors are the following: J. Alfred Marsh, President, Livingston Jenks, W. L. Elliott, H. C. Tilden and T. C. Richardson. The majority of these men are millionaires.

Mr. Frank E. Hartigan, manager Mobile Carriage Company, is in the East securing a line of gasoline cars for his company, and buses to run from the hotels to the ferry and depots.

LETTERS

Mrs. Riggs's Latest

In "Rebecca of Sunnybrook Farm" Kate Douglas Wiggin has written an excellent story for girls and grown ups. Rebecca was a misfit. Her mother had made a runaway match with a man whose romantic mother had named him Lorenzo do Medici, so it was almost a foregone conclusion that he would accumulate nothing but debts and children and then die, leaving them to do their best without him. There were seven of the little Randalls, all more or less handicapped by their names; Hannah Lucy was indebted to Lucy Larcom's poem for her nomenclature, while the heroine of the story, Rebecca Rowena, had "Ivanhoe" to thank for hers. Then there were John Halifax, Marquis de Lafayette, Fanny Ellsler, Jenny Lind and Miranda. One could not expect much efficiency from parents who could name their brood after this fashion, so it is not surprising to find that the farm is mortgaged and that the mother found it hard to sweep, or cook, or sew when there was a novel in the house, and one suspects that the novel was often there when the materials for cooking or sewing were wanted. Rebecca has been invited by some old maid aunts to make her home with them and obtain the benefit of schooling superior to what she can get at home, with a view to making her not only self-supporting, but a staff on which the rest of the family may lean. We make her acquaintance on the stage coach, where her lively chatter and quaint observations endear her to the driver, whose sole passenger she is . Rebecca is about ten years of age and small for her age, but those glorifiers of big families should hearken to what the little mite says: "Hannah and I haven't done anything but put babies to bed at night and take them up in the morning for years and years." Finding the child's frock buttoned in front, one of the aunts questioned whether it were not put on hind side foremost. "No, that's all right. If you have seven children you can't keep buttonin' and unbuttonin' 'em all the time—they have to do it themselves. We're all buttoned up in front at our house. Mira's only three, and she's buttoned in front, too." Transplanted from the farm, where this lively and imaginative bit of quicksilver has been half mother to the younger brood and where there was much liberty, Rebecca finds herself set down in "the brick house," with two spinsters, conventional and narrow, where it is a crime to walk up the sacred front stairs and the parlor is reserved for funerals, and a fly is as welcome as an elephant inside the house; yet, in spite of the restrictions and fault-findings, she manages to be reasonably happy, for Aunt Jane is soon won over, Emma Jane Perkins becomes her admiring friend, and the Simpsons are almost as numerous as the brothers and sisters at home. Rebecca soon becomes the leader of the school, and fortunately for the teacher, her leadership is helpful, for she is ambitious and capable, so we follow her through the Riverboro' district institution of learning, and the Wareham Academy, a wholesome, hard-working student, with a set purpose before her, to give a good account of herself. Rebecca is no prodigy. She does not blossom out on her graduation day into a wonderful poet or an astonishing novelist. She does not lift the mortgage from the farm by her unaided efforts, or make artists and lawyers of her young brothers and sisters, or do any of the remarkable things which girl heroines are usually guilty of. She does not even fall in love with Prince Fortunatus, though she may do that after the book is closed. Neither are her trials with her unsympathetic aunt Miranda of the heart-breaking order, but rather such as to strengthen her character and help to make a woman of her in time. The happenings at the district school, with its ungraded classes, its "exhibitions," and that curious "hypnotism"—for one can call it nothing else—which sets the whole assemblage to following the example of one, are so graphically told that those of the older generation, who passed through similar experiences, are fain to question whether, after all, our carefully graded classes are not a real loss instead of a gain to pupils. And those Simpsons, "town poor," with the poor children exerting themselves to the utmost to sell soap enough to gain the grand premium, a banquet lamp—they are a whole story in themselves. With the starvation diet upon which girls have been kept these many years in the matter of books suitable to their years and understanding, one cannot but hail "Rebecca" and the announcement of the re-publication of "Half a Dozen Housekeepers," by the same author, as the beginning of better things. This is a most timely volume, coming at it does

The Book Trade

What is known as the "literary season" is now open, though why there should be a "closed season" in book-making is one of the subjects which do not make their intricacies apparent on first inspection. From now on we shall hear of new books by new authors, and old books by old authors, varied by new books from old authors, new editions of old books, and occasionally an old book revamped by some new author. Of course the bulk of the product will be fiction, and the bulk of the fiction poor, but publishers are by no means pessimistic over the chances of more solid reading. One publisher, being asked why, in his opinion, nothing but novels was in demand, promptly disclaimed the need of formulating such an opinion, because, in his experience, the other books do sell, and sell well, too. There is less said about scientific or sociologic literature. It is not boomed and it is not advertised to the same extent that fiction is because, if the subject matter is substantial and the facts clearly presented, the volume is not superseded until something better takes its place, while with novels a year or so of popularity is a very long lease of life. They must be sold hot from the press if at all, and like the "barkers" who advertise the attractions of the Midway, each must make more noise than the other. The people whose taste leads them to prefer solid reading pursue their course undistracted by all the din, and the novel-readers are much in the position of the visitors to the Midway; they do not really care which they get, and one is as satisfactory as the other. On the principle of grasping something and running with it, each advertiser tries to have his wares the handiest to be made off with, and therein lies the science of book-selling.

Her Feeble Excuse

Margaret Sutton Briscoe, who has gained a modicum of fame as a writer of short stories, has recently published a book of doggerel verses, the product of her infant years, when she was permitted an injudicious familiarity with writing materials. Mrs. Briscoe apologizes for the appearance in print at this late day by stating that the fragments have been preserved (more or less miraculously, it would appear), and that she wishes to forestall posthumous publication. The tone of apology is such as to give the impression that Mrs. Briscoe would much rather not have the public made free to her infantile efforts, but that in these days a literary celebrity is not master of his own fate. It is unfortunately true, but Mrs. Briscoe is not such an aurora borealis in the literary sky that she need feel herself in serious danger. She is an acceptable worker in her line, but there are many well-informed people who have never heard of her. Moreover, one would like to ask what peculiar and scientifically disregarded change has taken place, that fire can no longer consume these pen products which the authors profess to be so reluctant about. If there were no choice between publishing now and leaving it for heirs to do, of course we should have to submit to the present infliction and congratulate the thrifty authors on gathering in their shekels, but since there is a middle course which they have overlooked, it is only fair to point it out, for their protection and our own.

The "Limerick up to Date" is another combination of memorandum and perpetual calendar, which is sure to find a host of delighted purchasers. The Limericks, of which there is one for each week in the year, are written by Ethel Watts Mumford, and the illustrations, drawings in red and black, and marginal decorations, are by Addison Mizner. The pages opposite the calendar are left blank for memoranda, and the calendar is itself something new and original, being made up of the name of the month in the principal languages of the world, including Chinese, Japanese, Greek, Italian, Spanish, French and German, with the Zodiacal sign. The "Limericks" have a variety of subjects as inspiration, and some of the rhymes are the acme of ingenuity. The Toyome Press of the Paul Elder Company has more than a continental reputation for these minor publications and the Limerick book will not detract from it.

DRUGGISTS 50¢ AND $1.00

The book-thief, and incidentally the chronic book-borrower, who is always a potential book-thief, has at last been accorded his deserts. On the end of a carved book-case prepared under the auspices of the Guild of Handicraftsmen for Lord Beauchamps there is a representation of the Tree of Knowledge, and the purloiner of the treasury, with his spoils under his arm, is placed with the other reptiles, at the foot of the tree.

George Ade appears to have succeeded in accomplishing his purpose of some day emancipating himself from the trammels of slang and writing in plain English. No one could read his Fables without discovering that Mr. Ade was a keen observer, and that such an artist in words could not fail to be equally expressive in legitimate English if he were to use it as a medium of expression. "In Babel," his new book, short stories of Chicago life, proves the proposition.

Precisely as predicted, "The Manuscript in a Red Box," is to be published under that title, having received in advance the advantages of the advertising. It turns out now that there was no such mystery in connection with the affair, for half the periodicals in London had been tendered the same story with a view to serial publication. The general agreement was that it was not suited to piecemeal publication, and the author was advised to let it appear in book form. Moreover, a Rev. Wm. Wood, a clergyman at Newport Fye, says he is responsible for having had it placed with the publishers who will produce it, and that it is the work of a recluse who resides near Falmouth. It remains now only to add that this much advertised and mysterious manuscript is an historical novel of the time of Charles I.

Mrs. Meynell is writing the text for an art book which is to be brought out before the holidays. It is to be entitled "The Children of the Old Masters," and will consist of sixty reproductions of children from the paintings of the masters.

Mrs. Joseph Pennell is to write the authorized life of Whistler, and Mortimer Menpes is already hard at work on a book concerning the late eccentric painter. Mrs. Pennell, by the way, is the niece of the late Charles G. Leland, who, though universally regarded as simply a humorist whose fame rested on the "Hans Breitmann Ballads," was really a traveler of repute and a linguist of ability. He probably knew more about the Gypsies than any one else of his generation, and Mrs. Pennell, who shared his interest, was frequently associated with him in his Gypsy expeditions.

A NEW LAW

The Board of Commissioners in Optometry according to a new law enacted by the last Legislature, has issued a Certificate to Mr. George Mayerle, the German Expert Optician at 1071 Market Street, authorizing him to practice Optometry.and prescribe glasses to those having weak eyes and poor sight. Mr. George Mayerle has probably prescribed glasses to more prominent men of the world than any other optician in this country. The fact that the highest U. S. Army, Navy and Government officials and most eminent clergymen, judges and educators of California are using his glasses should be sufficient evidence of his wonderful ability to treat most complicated cases with accuracy and absolute perfection.

Commander U. S. Navy. MARE ISLAND CAL., July 20, 1903. MR. GEORGE MAYERLE—Dear Sir: The eyeglasses you made for me are the most satisfactory pair I have had in the last thirty years. Check in payment is enclosed herewith. Very respectfully, W. W. KIMBALL, Commander U. S. Navy.

The President of Santa Clara College. MR. GEORGE MAYERLE—Dear Sir: The glasses ordered came in good time. They are excellent and I am more than pleased with them. Yours very truly, ROBERT E. KENNA, S. J.

Office Chief of Police. It gives me much pleasure to recommend to the public, Mr. George Mayerle, of San Francisco. I have been using glasses for the past four years, and during that time have consulted several opticians, but not until I had consulted Mr. George Mayerle and had him fit glasses to my eyes did I get entire satisfaction. Respectfully, J. H. ANDERSON, Sergeant of Police.

Admiral Dewey, who used George Mayerle's glasses during the Spanish-American war. and is still using them with much satisfaction, highly recommends Mr. George Mayerle, and sends the following testimonial: MR. GEORGE MAYERLE—My Dear Sir: I am still using with much satisfaction the glasses you sent me at Manila; also the new ones suit my eyes perfectly. Yours very truly, GEORGE DEWEY.

Examination of Eyes will be made FREE OF CHARGE. Hours 9 to 12 a. m., 2 to 6 p. m., and 8 to 9 Evenings

Action brought in the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and the Complaint filed in the office of the Clerk of said County of San Francisco.

The People of the State of California send Greeting to:

A. C. Freese (Administrator of the Estate of Pierre Langaron (deceased), Eleanora O Salmon, Eleanora O. Salmon (as Trustee) Louise Emile Salmon, Francis Salmon, Alfred Salmon, Eleanora Alexandrina Salmon, Joseph Reavilo, also known as Jose Raviolo, otherwise known as Jose Raviola, Jean Marcellin Pourguery, Tomas Pidello, Gu llaume Pache, Jean Pache, Gaspard Sadony, Eleanora O Salmon (Executrix of the Last Will of Francis Salmon, deceased) John Doe, Richard Roe. James Black, Mary Green and Mary Doe, also all other persons unknown, claiming any right, title, estate, lien or interest in the real property described in the complaint adverse to Plaintiff's ownership, or any cloud upon Plaintiff's title thereto

YOU ARE HEREBY DIRECTED to appear and answer in an action entitled as above, brought against you in the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, within ten days after the service on you of this Summons—if served within this County; or within thirty days if served elsewhere.

And you are hereby notified that, unless you appear and answer as above required, the said Plaintiff will take judgment for any money or damages demanded in the complaint as arising upon contract or he will apply to the Court for any other relief demanded in this complaint.

That the property involved in and affected by said action is described as follows, to wit:

All that certain lot, piece or parcel of land, situate, lying and being in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, commencing at a point where the Northerly line of Union street intersects the Easterly line of Dupont street; thence running Easterly along said line of Union street Twenty-three (23) feet; thence at right angles Northerly Thirty-four (34) feet and four and one-half (4½) inches thence at right angles Westerly Twenty-three (23) feet to the said Easterly line of Dupont street, and thence Southerly and along said line of Dupont street Thirty four (34) feet and four and one half (4½) inches to the point of commencement.

That the object of said action is to obtain a judgment and decree of the above entitled Court adjudging and determining that the above named defendants and all other persons claiming any right, title, estate, lien or interest in the real property described in the plaintiff's complaint adverse to plaintiff's ownership or any cloud upon plaintiff's title thereto have not, and that none of them has any estate, right, title, lien or interest whatever in or to said real property, or in or to any part or parcel thereof, and that the title of plaintiff is good and valid, and that said defendants and all of said persons unknown as aforesaid be forever enjoined and debarred from asserting any claim whatever in or to said real property, or in or to any part or parcel thereof adverse to the plaintiff, and for such other, further and additional relief as to the Court may seem meet and proper in the premises, and for costs of suit.

ALFRED H. COATES, Plaintiff. vs. EMMA C. COATES, Defendant. — Action brought in the Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and the Complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said Superior Court.

The People of the State of California send Greeting to:

EMMA C. COATES Defendant.

YOU ARE HEREBY REQUIRED to appear in an action brought against you by the above-named Plaintiff in the Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and to answer the Complaint filed therein within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this Summons, if served within this County; or if served elsewhere, within thirty days.

The said action is brought to obtain a judgment and decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony now existing between plaintiff and defendant, upon the ground of defendant's willful desertion of said plaintiff for more than one year prior to the commencement of this action and upon the ground of defendant's extreme cruelty to plaintiff as appears from the com plaint on file herein to which special reference is hereby made; also for general relief, as will more fully appear in the Complaint on file, to which special reference is hereby made.

All of which will more fully appear in the Complaint on file herein to which you are hereby referred.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said Complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief therein demanded.

IN THE DAYS OF OLD

Here are some samples of pioneer journalism that are not without interest today:

Grateful Supervisors.—Two insane men were brought to Stockton from San Francisco yesterday, and placed in the Asylum. The Board of Supervisors of the Bay City voted their thanks to the Steam Navigation Company for trusting them for the passage money.—San Joaquin Republican, December 6, 1856.

A New Hospital.—The Sisters of Mercy have purchased a lot near Rincon Point, in San Francisco, upon which they propose to erect a hospital. The cost of the ground was $10,000, which was raised by subscription.—San Joaquin Republican, Dec. 7, 1856.

Yellow Journalism in the Fifties

The proprietors of the Alta by a previous steamer sent down a printer to Acapulco, with types and cases, and at that place he went aboard the Golden Age, enroute from New York, set up the news, and as soon as the vessel arrived in San Francisco, an extra was issued. That is what we call enterprise; whether it pays or not, is another matter.—San Joaquin Republican, December 5, 1856.

The Daily Morning "Call"

This spirited little morning newspaper, edited and published by a combination of practical printers, in San Francisco, has at length been laid on our table by expresses. Its appearance is neat and mechanical, and its matter is got up with care and judgment. Its size is diminutive, but its style is power. We hope the boys may succeed in their enterprise.—San Joaquin Republican, December 5, 1856.

News of Buchanan's Election Reaches San Francisco

On Thursday evening last, the grand torchlight procession of the democracy, in honor of the election of James Buchanan to the Presidency, took place. The Democracy of Sacramento, Stockton and other interior cities was represented. Mr. Hoff was Grand Marshal and it was the grandest and most enthusiastic parade San Francisco has ever witnessed. In every part of the city, along the route which the procession passed, a large number of houses were brilliantly illuminated. Along Stockton street, Montgomery, Powell, Clay, First, Third, Minna and many other thoroughfares they presented a sight never before witnessed in California. Most of them were one blaze of light, and reflected great credit upon the fine taste displayed in the arrangement of their lights. Montgomery Block was illuminated in every story, and the proprietors, Messrs. Halleck, Peachy and Billings, spared no expense to make the display as brilliant as possible. Among the most prominent places lighted up were the Herald office, Wright's Building on Jackson street, Dr. Ashe's house, Judge Freelon's house on Russian Hill, Judge Thompson's and other rooms in the building opposite the Custom House. Hunt's stable on Sacramento street, Porter and Flenner's stables on Kearny street, the Sheriff's office, the Sun office, R. Sinton's and W. M. Lent's place of residence, Mr. Sanders', corner of Geary and Market streets; Hugh McNulty and Peter Donahue's, and other private residences on Minna street; two buildings in the rear of Montgomery block were illuminated by some person who could not sufficiently manifest his joy by other means; R. Page's house adjoining Washington Market, F. Argenti's on Powell street, F. Marks, P. Chrystal's, J. P. Haven's, Capt. John Scheffer and many other private residences on Powell street. Stockton street was brilliantly illuminated. E. Casserly's, H. A. Cobb's, Judge Thornton's, Dr. Max Wells, Judge J. P. Hoge, and many others on this street, were illuminated with a splendor and brilliancy seldom equalled. Mr. John O'Meara's house, on the corner of Washington and Dupont streets, was one brilliant blaze of light. The windows of the Young Men's Democratic Club on the Plaza contained seven hundred and twenty burners, and, during the evening, an innumerable quantity of fireworks were sent off from the roof of the building. Several of the engine houses and many of the public saloons throughout the city were handsomely illuminated with different colored lights, the whole presenting an appearance which will long be remembered in our city as a display well worthy of the democracy of California.—Condensed from a lengthy report in San Francisco Herald, December 5, 1856.

The Triumph of Schmitz

The people have decreed that we shall have two years more of Schmitz-Ruef rule in this city. Let us hope they will have no cause for regret. It is an aphorism that people are governed as they deserve, but we do not think that the people of San Francisco justly incurred the infliction that was visited upon them last Tuesday. Town Talk is of the opinion that responsibility for the perpetuation of Boss Ruef's power should be charged against the daily press of this city. If those personal organs of ambitious politicians, whose aspirations impel them to disloyalty to the people, had exposed the character of the Ruef-Schmitz partnership when it was established, and had not refrained from proper criticism of the Administration during the twenty-one months preceding the campaign, they would have aroused the indignation of this community to such an extent that Mayor Schmitz would have been hooted through the town. During those twenty-one months Mayor Schmitz and his thrifty mentor enjoyed immunity from criticism. They nursed the small aspirations of the newspaper proprietors, and thereby kept the white light of publicity from beating upon them. It was not until after the campaign opened that the dailies undertook to expose the character of the Schmitz administration, and it was then too late. Their fulminations against the Mayor and his mentor were received with distrust. They were believed to be actuated by purely personal motives. Instead of arousing the resentment of the people they excited sympathy for the men they abused. Since the election Mayor Schmitz has publicly boasted that he won in the face of the united opposition of the press. The fact is that he owes his re-election to the daily newspapers who acquiesced in all his official doings during the twenty-one months preceding his nomination. He is also indebted to those newspapers which deliberately and mendaciously represented throughout the campaign that Henry J. Crocker was not in the race. The voters of this city intent upon preventing the re-election of Mayor Schmitz were sufficiently numerous to have accomplished their purpose, and they would have done so had they not been deceived by the journalistic boomers of Franklin K. Lane. All well informed people knew that Lane had no chance of election, but his boomers, by artful misrepresentation, created the impression among some people that the Republican candidate was the victim of treachery, and thus they defected from Crocker the votes that would have elected him. The campaign as conducted by Mr. Lane and his supporters was one of slander, misrepresentation and prevarication, and now, though we deplore the re-election of Mr. Schmitz, believing that it will prove a serious misfortune to this city, at the same time we rejoice that the quietus has been put on Mr. Lane's insistent political aspirations. Lane 's no longer the man to arouse the conscientious scruples of sincere Democrats, who, though they were reluctant to abandon their party, were loth to encourage a spectacular mountebank and pestiferous demagogue.

The Inhuman Pedagogue

An Oakland teacher has been denounced as inhuman because she chided one of her pupils for disorderly conduct. Little miss had hysterics and arrived home with a tear-swollen face and a case of spinal curvature, and the teacher is to be dismissed and confined to a dark cell on bread and water diet for the rest of her natural life, if sympathetic journalists are permitted to pass sentence. The child, who is an only darling, is some seven years of age, and is represented as being of an extremely delicate and sensitive temperament and unable to bear the mildest correction without having to go to bed and call on the services of a college of physicians. This may or may not be true. It is a characteristic of "only" children to be sensitive and delicate—also to be undisciplined and to have healthy tempers which render life a heavy burden to all who come in contact with them. If children are in such a state of health that they cannot be reprimanded for their misdemeanors without all this fuss, the public school is no place for them. They should be taught at home either by their private governesses or by their fond mothers, and the chances are that by the time mamma has put in a few days trying to induce darling to do what she has no mind to do she will be ready to concede that the life of a public school teacher, trying to produce uniform results from a heterogeneous collection of sixty or more darlings each bent on doing nothing in a different way, is not a foretaste of paradise. Teachers are not cruel or inhuman. In the majority of cases they are the refinement of patience and sympathy, and it is no uncommon experience to find that the very parents who make the loudest outcry when a finger is shaken at their precious ones, after their disobedience has demoralized every other child in the vicinity, will fly into a passion on their own account for the smallest infraction of rules. This business of toasting teachers on a hot gridiron every time that some young scamp carries a tale home has about reached the limit. It is only necessary to watch the conduct of children on the street or anywhere else, to note the necessity for discipline. Parents will not do what the case calls for and teachers dare not. What is there left but the juvenile court and the reform school? When children are so far below the average in mental and physical health that they cannot endure the hardships of public school attendance, the proper place for them is the Glen Ellen Home for Feeble Minded, or a hospital for incurables. Teachers have enough, and more than enough, foisted upon them without having to act as special nurses.

Anti-Boycott Law

Public sentiment against the boycott is spreading throughout the country. Pestiferous demagogues have long been responsible for what has appeared to be general acquiescence in the use of this iniquitous and cruel instrument of coercion, but to such an extent has injustice been inflicted that the sense of fair play which has ever distinguished the American people has been aroused, and the probability is that before many years anti-boycott laws will be in operation in every State in the Union. Alabama has enacted a statute for the express purpose of affording protection from the boycott, from picketing and from all the various kinds of intimidation which strikers are accustomed to employ. Wisconsin has an anti-boycott law, the validity of which has been affirmed by the Supreme Court of the State, and Senator Ralston of this State promises to introduce a bill in the next Legislature formulated on the lines of the Alabama statute. That statute is well calculated to restrain strikers from intimidating employers and non-unionist workers. It prohibits boycotts, conspiracies against lawful business, or the printing or circulation of notices of boycotts. The boycott is obviously an infringement of constitutional rights, and it should therefore be prohibited. The position of organized labor toward employers and non-union men is morally and legally untenable. Moreover the attitude of organized labor is not beneficial to labor. The unnatural advances in labor are burdensome to the consumer. The result is that the demand for the products of organized labor diminishes. A shrinkage in demand means a check to industry and lessened employment. Wage-earners must be paid in accordance with the law of supply and demand. Any other system is impracticable.

The Woman's Club

Some men have a prejudice against woman's clubs. They are imbued with the old-fashioned notion that the ideal wife should be so fond of her home that she would consider it waste of time to attend to club affairs. The ideal wife, according to the old-fashioned notion, may fall far short of being an ideal companion. The man who is satisfied with a good housekeeper for a wife is seldom an ideal husband. It is the woman with a taste for art and literature who makes home worth while. She interests her husband. She is an inspiring companion, and there is less likelihood of her losing her husband's affections than if she were merely a good housekeeper. It is the woman's club that develops a woman mentally, and therefore the club is beneficial to the home. Any influence that heightens the charms of a wife is a wholesome one and should be encouraged. Sad indeed is the fate of the man wedded to the quintessential extract of mediocrity who yearns for intellectual companionship.

An Unwholesome Influence

It is high time that some protest was entered against the subjects selected for illustration in the so-called comic supplements issued by the Sunday papers. The wretched things appear to have a fascination for children of all ages, but what good comes of familiarizing them with the vulgarities and unchildish antics of "Willie Cute" and the Katzenjammers? Most children are mischievous and egotistical enough without any prompting. Family discipline is a lost art in this generation, but bad as it is, there is nothing gained by putting into the hands of children of tender years these examples of precocious disrespect to teachers and parents, and extravagant expositions of vulgarity which border upon indecency. Some of the good dames who find so much fault with Mother Goose and the Standard Fairy Tales might much better turn their attention to the comic supplements. Lately a supp. humorist has taken to giving his version of the happenings on board the Ark and in the Garden of Eden. Of course it is all in the line of Higher Criticism, which does not admit that there ever was an Ark or an Eden, but it is just as well to go a bit slow about these matters. It is easier to tear down than to build up. The modern child is sufficiently irreligious and skeptical without special prompting. The experiment of raising a generation with practically no religious training has not proved a success and one of the questions which is agitating educational bodies all over the land today is how to instill into young minds the same reverence and understanding of sacred subjects which was a matter of course up to within the last quarter of the nineteenth century. The newspapers which make such loud boasts of being public educators are not doing much good by their editorial comments or their publications of news and discussions, when they deliberately counteract any good they might accomplish with the parents by corrupting the stream at the fountain-head in giving the children illustrated object lessons in blasphemy. Foxy Grandpa, the Katzenjammers, the Teasers, Willie Cute, and the rest of the rabble could be comfortably spared, and Adam's Troubles in Raising Cain are in no need of duplication through sub-conscious suggestion.

The Immortal Redwood

After careful investigation, the Bureau of Forestry at Washington has announced that there is not the slightest foundation for the oft-repeated report that the redwood forests of California are threatened with speedy extermination. It has been ascertained that there is enough merchantable virgin redwood lumber still standing to supply the present demand for centuries, and that the redwood forests are able to reproduce themselves abundantly in commercial quantities. After a series of observations of the capacity of the redwood for reproduction it is decisively announced that two or three crops may be gathered in the course of a century, and that therefore it is profitable to hold cut-over lands for future crops. Redwood is about the only merchantable lumber which will naturally reproduce itself in paying quantity and quality. The theory has been held by foresters that efforts toward the reproduction of the redwoods would be futile, as conditions under which the trees started, a thousand or more years ago, no longer exist; but it has been demonstrated by the Bureau of Forestry that in thirty years under fair conditions, a second growth of redwood should yield two thousand feet, board measure, to the acre. Of course future generations of the redwood will never attain the superb dimensions of the patriarchs of the virgin forest, for the simple reason that the sawmill man cannot afford to wait, but it is now believed that the whole redwood country, from Oregon to Monterey bay, can be made to perpetuate itself in timber and regain much of its original value. Two precautions are necessary to insure a profitable second growth from cut-over lands. First, care must be observed that in lumbering the virgin trees the smaller ones are not destroyed in the process; and, second, forest fires must be avoided or stamped out as much as possible.

The Plagiarizing Habit

The Gaston prize for oratory at Brown's University was awarded in June last to Maurice B. Rich, a youth by no means devoid of ability, since on his arrival in America he was unable to speak the English language, but has worked his way through school and college, taking a high rank in all his classes. Now it appears that the oration by which he won the medal was not original, but was a copy of an address delivered at Hamilton in 1901 by Professor Harry Mintz, and though Master Rich indignantly disclaims any intention, the evidence against him is such that he has been practically convicted of gross plagiarism and obliged to surrender his medal. In commenting on the occurrence an Eastern paper remarks that "fortunately such incidents are rare in our educational institutions." Unfortunately they are anything but rare, though the faculty generally succeeds in keeping the knowledge from the public. It is seldom that medals or prizes of any kind are won honestly by a competition among students. Leaving out of consideration those occasions when outside influences are brought to bear on teachers and committees of award, it is more likely to be the student who can levy tribute on the best brains, than the one who has the most gray matter, who is successful. Much as is said about the injurious over-stimulation of the ambitious, the greater injury is not in overworking their mentality, but in overstraining their honesty. Parents and uncles and big brothers and kind friends are all ready to pay tribute. It is not often that printed matter is made use of, for there is too much danger of detection, but some are quite willing to take even that risk. A few years ago the daughter of a clergyman, attending an Eastern college, won the prize for an essay which proved to be a copy of a paper by Charles Dudley Warner hardly cold in type, and for a while in our own city it was thought advisable to deprive the graduates of the high school of the pleasure of a public appearance because of a similar escapade. One of the young ladies presented as a graduating thesis a poem which, though nothing wonderful from a literary standpoint, was a creditable performance for a schoolgirl. She read her effusion at the exercises and experienced the joy of seeing it printed in all the morning papers. As it happened, the poem was written by a Boston actress and circulated in manuscript among her friends, some of whom recognized it at once. In all the competitions and prize contests for children, whether in school or at large, the one who honestly tries on his own merit is apt to be distanced because he is competing not against those of his own years and condition but against the mature brains of the relatives of other contestants. As long as merit is measured by results this must be so, and as there is no probability that the standard of public honesty will ever be higher than it is, there is no course open but to abolish all medals and prizes and eliminate the spectacular element from educational work.

As to Letter Writing

"The decay of letter writing" is becoming as fruitful a theme as was "the decay of conversation" a few years ago. But Uncle Sam's men in gray will hardly come forward to substantiate the ones who profess to regret the falling off of written communications. "Conversation" used to mean the gathering together of a number of listeners who sat silent while one monopolized the attention of all, and an evening spent in such an assemblage meant the listening to a monologue in which some one else took part only to the extent of asking a leading question to start another stream of talk. Letter writing, in the old sense, will probably never be revived, but for that there is no cause for regret. Long ago, when people sat down to "indite epistles," the occasion was as solemn as that of a funeral. There were certain forms and ceremonies to be observed, and to take up a pencil in modern fashion and literally dash off a page or half a dozen pages, would have been regarded as almost indecent. The plan pursued by Miss Deborah Jenkins of "Cranford" was the one generally in vogue, and staid and elderly gentlefolk almost invariably wrote their letters on slates and corrected them rigidly before daring to commit themselves to paper and ink. And the little subterfuge of "seizing the last half-hour before post time" was a recognized formula. Then there followed the long and circumstantial account of the health of the family and the neighborhood, and inquiries of like character, interspersed with pious reflections. And as epistolary elegance was presumed to be betokened by polysyllabic diction, and as uncertainties in orthography were unpardonable sins, the occasion of communication by letter, even to the most intimate relatives, was one of sore tribulation. People in these days feel no occasion to discuss minutely the character of the governor or the mayor or the general in chief, nor do they lay out at large their fears of the trend of public policy. The minutiæ of public calamities and the outcome of the political situation are all left to the newspapers, and the stimulus of having important news to communicate has vanished. But if people really did cease to write letters why should the fact be deplored? When we see how children will expose parents, and parents their children, how wives will use their husbands' letters, and sweethearts and lovers call all the world to a carrion feast when their tempers are sufficiently ruffled, and more than all, how the whole world rushes with breakneck speed to turn every scrap of paper to account when a man or woman of prominence has passed beyond the jurisdiction of the world, and the unholy joy with which the vultures gather at the banquet, the wonder is that there are any left with so little caution as still to write letters.

A Tale of Bricks Without Straw

I have traced those "few remaining bricks" from Yokohama to Hankow; and I have counted them from the Yangtsze to the Peiho. I have seen the "humble cots" of Kuling and I have sat beneath the drippings of the sanctuaries of Peking. I can vouch for the authenticity of the accusation, for I have weighed the missionary of China and Japan in the balance and found him wanting.

You have heard the story: "We have erected a sanctuary in the land of the heathen, and with the few remaining bricks we have built for ourselves a humble cot close by." So ran the epistle of Saint Dingbat, D.D., to the Ephesians of Kalamazoo, concluding with a sanctified postscript setting forth that, "having exhausted all our available funds we are sorely in need of a few dollars with which to sustain the lives which we have devoted to this holy cause."

I have lounged on the verandah of the missionary who wrote that epistle, and I must confess that the shadow of the rock in a dreary land was not more grateful than the cool shelter of that expanse of bamboo awning. In the "humble cot" of this missionary there are many rooms and each room is furnished with all the "modern conveniences." In the sweltering heat of an Asiatic midsummer the guests who are entertained within the walls of these "few remaining bricks" may be compared with legion. Punkahs swing continuously throughout the "cot" and servants answer the slightest nod of the toilers of the vineyard resting from their labor in this Beulah land provided by the "few dollars contributed to sustain the lives devoted to this holy cause." The apartments are carpeted with dragon rugs from Tientsin, the walls are adorned with kakemonos from the ateliers of far Kyoto and Tokyo, the curtains that rustle in the occasional breezes of Pechli's glassy gulf were woven on the looms of Soochow, the brasses, jade and bronzes of the shelves and niches are loot from the palaces of the Forbidden City. There is nothing to be desired in the "humble cot" of Saint Dingbat, D.D.; his Scotch is imported, his tansan bears the genuine label, his cigars are from Manila and his cigarettes are golden-tipped after the manner of those that are made in the levant for export to the pampered epicures of the Farthest East.

I was very, very comfortable as I lounged on the broad verandah of Saint Dingbat's humble cot, "looking lazy to the sea" from the purple slopes of the Western Hills overhanging the missionary summer resort at Pei-tai-ho.

Down in the village is the "sanctuary"—a measly little chapped with a seating capacity of two hundred and twenty and a congregation of seven coolies—"rice Christians" they are called, because they are Saint Dingbat's congregation for revenue only, deriving profit from the missionary trade in the sale of fish and vegetables.

When Saint Dingbat preaches in the "sanctuary" his congregation is larger, for he insists that all his servants not actually required in the preparation of the Sunday dinner and the care of the missionary guests too tired or too bored to attend "divine service" shall sit in the pews while he hurls doctrine at them in Chinese and prays for them in English—the language which his particular god best understands.

Saint Dingbat pays his servants a wage that in the aggregate would not support a roustabout on the Stuart street docks. These servants are invariably spoken to in the Chinese language by the inmates of Saint Dingbat's household for fear that if they were to gain even a smattering of pidgin English they would demand the increase of wages that go with a Chinese servant's knowledge of English.

Mrs. Saint Dingbat, who was originally from the back settlements of Missouri, when her husband was a circuit preacher starving on two hundred dollars a year, is now provided with a servant for her every need. She has a maid, a chamber girl, an amah for each of her youngest children, a mafoo to groom her horse and drive her carriage, a hostler to take care of her stable, and a tingchi or messenger to run errands for her. When the weather is unusually warm and she is beyond the sweep of the punkahs two little girls fan her to sleep over her novel or keep her awake while she gossips with some sour-faced missionary lady from the hill region of Shantung.

Mrs. Saint Dingbat is the fortunate mother of seven children for each of whom the Board of Foreign Missions in America pays one hundred dollars a year, in the hope that the money will be expended upon their education. To be accurate, however, Mrs. Saint Dingbat is the genuine mother of only three of these children—she has adopted the others to swell the educational account with the Home Board. Two of these, it must be stated, are dead, but the Rev. Saint Dingbat, D.D. has been so busy curing the heathen of his blindness that he has not had time to notify the Board of his affliction. By and by he will forget all about it.

When Saint Dingbat goes abroad he wears a complete Chinese costume, including the tail, and as his natural hair is a very bright auburn the tail is a streak of red dangling heelward from the nape of his neck. The heathen Chinese have a sense of humor, whatever the learned ethnologists may say to the contrary, and those Chinese who observe the Rev. Saint Dingbat in passing show laugh heartily and jest as merrily as their cumbrous vernacular will permit.

Saint Dingbat is a profound metaphysician. He has studied logic and he knows the sophists by the back. Aided by prayer and such texts as he was able to find in Deuteronomy and Leviticus, he has thoroughly reconciled his conscience to service with Mammon coincident with his duty to his God. He has thrown the protecting arm of the United States around his "converts," whom the ungodly of North China call "rice Christians," and when one of them is in trouble with the Chinese authorities he is prompt to save the wretch from the "persecution" expressly prohibited by the treaty between the United States and China. In the beginning the Chinese magistrates were inclined to flout this sort of interference with the laws of China, but a word or two from the nearest Consul, emphasized by a threat of "gunboats" by Saint Dingbat himself, soon convinced the taotais that it is useless to kick against the pricks, and now Saint Dingbat's "flock" can rob their neighbors to their hearts' content.

Of course Saint Dingbat does not exercise his influence with the representatives of the United States Government wholly for the well being of his "converts." In China everybody is entitled to a "cumshaw" for their services in addition to their legitimate wages. This "cumshaw" is vulgarly called a "squeeze" by Saint Dingbat's contemners, but saints have been subjected to this sort of thing ever since saints were canonized, and Saint Dingbat cares not a candareen for the envious carping of those who thus attempt to persecute him.

Many a fat "cumshaw" has Saint Dingbat received from those whom he has saved from the Chinese penalty of their crimes and misdemeanors. Some of this wealth is in land, some of it is in household gear, and some of it is in "concessions" that he is "negotiating" with Gentile speculators upon the basis of ultimate profit to himself when the work of "development" shall be forward.

Saint Dingbat is prospering in the land which the Lord his God has given him. All his prayers have been answered. He is not yet rich beyond the dreams of his avarice, but he hopes to be. There is only one lingering doubt in the mind of Saint Dingbat: he cannot determine whether his prayers have been answered by God or Mammon. But he does not lose any sleep trying to solve the doubt.

During the Boxer uprising Saint Dingbat fled to Shanghai. He was not willing to sacrifice himself as a martyr in his own person but he left behind a lot of vicarious sacrifices and proxy martyrs in the "converts" of his "flock" and the servants of his household, all of whom were beheaded "to end the misery" of their preliminary torture. It was a glorious sacrifice and it was rightly rewarded. The share of the indemnity awarded to Saint Dingbat for his losses enabled him to build the "humble cot" in which he now lives at Peitai-ho, and the "contributions" he forced from the village authorities of his neighborhood "after the relief," on the plea that the money was for the destitute Chinese of his parish, gave him enough to furnish his abode as I found it—including payment for the stolen goods of the Peking palaces bought from marauding soldiers and Chinese robbers.

I am informed that Saint Dingbat has recently sent another epistle to the Ephesians of Kalamazoo asking for immediate funds to be applied in alleviating the sufferings of Christian natives in the famine districts. To be sure, there is no famine anywhere in China at this time, but the Home Board is not informed in that matter and I have not the slightest doubt that the Ephesians will open their purses to the Rev. Saint Dingbat as widely as they open their hearts to the dying Christians of Szechuen.

The Joy-Makers

BY HARRY COWELL

Life, despite the admirable efforts of this and that big-browed philosopher, has ever refused to be imprisoned in a phrase. What it is, we flatter ourselves we know, until some one brings our ignorance home to us by demanding a definition. Then the inadequacy of our knowledge is made evident by our want of adequate words. Some day wisdom may be able to confine in inescapable speech that most elusive thing, that sum of all illusions—life. Meanwhile we live; we do we know not what, or we know not what is done to us; we define in acts, or in feelings rather, the indefinable. While we await the fitting words, we may find it to our advantage to regard life (human life, at least) as "the permanent possibility of sensation"—sensation pleasurable or painful, as the case may be. The end of all our endeavors—what we seek, what we avoid—is a state of consciousness, varying infinitely from agony to ecstasy. "To a single sharp impression, with a sense in it...what is real in our life fines itself down." Fate pays all its scores in feeling. The Gould who spends all his wits in making money and the Goethe who spends all his money in making bons mots, must each take for his final reward an emotion—of exquisite quality, enviable, or merely commonplace, worth no man's while. To reduce finance to terms of feeling is the beginning of other-worldly wisdom. For every man, life is practically, if not theoretically, the sum total of his sensations.

Whether we observe the better known world within us or 'that which we can only conjecture to be without," facts there are and to spare to give countenance to the philosophy of Schopenhauer and his disciples. Sorrow is the plentiful gray warp of our existence here below, and joy—a scant gold thread—the woof. In obedience to natural law tears fall to earth and sparks fly upward. To find mustard-seed in a home where grief has never lodged even for a night is no less difficult than to bring the dead to life. Man, though begotten in pleasure, is born in pain and to pain. Indeed, were begetting as grievous a thing as bringing forth, the race of reeds that think, along with the rest of sentient creation, would quickly perish from the earth.

Man being such—a bundle of fading feelings bound together by a personality; such being his state—a few smiles and many tears—should he not welcome with heart aglow the artist, the joy-maker, who "comes to him professing frankly to give nothing but the highest quality to his moments as they pass, and simply for those moments' sake"? Death and sorrow themselves, seen through Art, take on the color of the rose. Even to the rare moments Love brings, Art adds a rarity otherwise unattainable. The love that feeds on music grows strangely fine. Over a "golden book of beauty," Paola and Francesca pore, and the love that is born of literature lives in literature forever. Love has no greater ally than Art.

And when Love fails you, and the face of your dearest dream fades away before the bitter, gray, cold dawn; when by day you pray for night, and by night for day; when by day and night you repeat after Gautier, "and sleep is, with the exception of death, the best thing in life"; it is Art, the ever faithful friend of man, that keeps alive in you the will to live, that renews in you the joy of living.

The happiest of all fates that may befall a man is to be born a joy-maker, a genuine joy-maker, and one who takes an endless delight in delighting. To be Spring personified and watch winter disappear at your approach; to change gray to green; to see as you pass by the pallid lips of men and women brighten and break into smiles like the opening of flowers; to make heavy feet lightsome; to cause silent songs to rise from quickened hearts like a musical perfume; to be born to do these and the like things—this to me is of mortal lots the most enviable.

Though man is seldom merry when he hears sweet music—even that of Mozart—musicians are none the less your joy-makers par excellence. Think of Paderewski, Pablo Casals, or Paganini of old, passing from place to place, giving purest joy to tens of thousands, taking from sorrow its bitterness, making it beautiful! My aged friend, W—— G——, during the last sad years of his life had for company those two unwelcome guests, Poverty and Pain. Once or twice I saw joy rejuvenate him. Was it when he called to mind the days of his courtship? Was it when he lived over again dead years of health and wealth? Was it when his prattling grandson rode a-horseback of his knee? No; it was when he told of how, long ago, he had listened for fifty nights to the singing of Jenny Lind.

Poets, too, are they not master joy-makers? From old Dan Chaucer to Algernon Swinburne is a goodly succession of these princes of pleasure. Over what vasty realms of delight do they not reign! Sooner or later, those who sow smiles reap golden harvests of the world's gratitude.

Even the essayist, who among the dull pass for dull fellows indeed—is not the world indebted to them for no little delight? Enough, to mention a few names: Montaigne the master; Stevenson, the disciple; Lamb, the beloved of all who read books.

Nor must we forget the humbler sort of joy-makers, those lesser sums in human guise, all sweetness and light, who beam upon you from some nearby heaven and line your little clouds with silver. For a smile give them a half-smile, and they are content. Unlike musician and poet and essayist, they ask nothing of Fame.

The Greater Victory

There was a way, a joy, a mystic, unnamed thing
A dreamer sought—
As vague as air that's troubled by some swallow's wing—
Ideal, intangible, and shadow-fraught.

Impossible, it seemed, so much it held desired,
So much implied,
So near, yet so remote; uncertainty conspired
To make it seem by distance deified.

One day the prize was gained; he struggled through despair,
Through ways defiled,
To grasp a poisoned cup; the watching world stood there
And so he pressed it to his lips and smiled.

MABEL PORTER PITTS.

The Saunterer

Campaign Aftermath

With the prestige that he won in the campaign that was brought to a close last Tuesday, Abe Ruef is likely to become a very important figure in State politics. Prestige is a valuable asset in politics. The politician dearly loves a winner. Many people believe that Schmitz's victory was due to the generalship of Ruef, and in the aftermath of the campaign one hears a great deal about the wonderful strategy of the shrewd young attorney who deserted the camp of the Republican leaders to manage the fight of his protege. As an instance of his shrewdness it is related that he rounded up the bulk of the crowd that attended the Democratic mass-meeting at the Pavilion Monday night. His purpose, it is explained, was to create the impression that Lane was leading in the race, and thereby divert from Crocker the votes of those who were eager to beat Schmitz. It is believed by many that the meeting did have a disastrous effect on Crocker's chances, for it attracted a very large throng of people and caused many voters to believe that the tide of public sentiment had turned to Lane.

The Money That Was Spent

I do not know to what extent Abe Ruef's strategy contributed to the success of Schmitz, but he undoubtedly handled the campaign fund very adroitly. To be sure it was a very large fund, and it was not difficult to make a whirlwind fight with money so plentiful as it appeared to be in the Schmitz camp. The Republicans were handicapped throughout the campaign from lack of funds. Never before was money so scarce in Republican campaign headquarters. The big public corporations that usually contribute to the Republican campaign fund, with one exception, declined to do so this year. The Southern Pacific Company was the only corporation that appeared to be interested in the defeat of Schmitz. All the others were satisfied to see him elected. Crocker's campaign was handled badly from the beginning. The management of it was put into the hands of business men who have never been initiated into the mysteries of practical politics, and not only did they fail to out-manoeuvre Mr. Ruef but they couldn't raise sufficient money to make a showing. There was less than fifteen thousand dollars spent directly in the interest of Mr. Crocker, whereas over fifty thousand dollars went to defray the cost of the Schmitz campaign. Lane's managers had over twenty thousand dollars at their disposal, and I believe that a large fraction came out of the Phelan wallet.

When you order your whiskey with soda on the side be sure the former is Chapin & Gore's—that's good.

The Mayor's Intentions

Boss Ruef has informed some of his friends that he contemplates going abroad and separating himself from a little of his wealth, studying the politics of the Old World. The friends of Mayor Schmitz are saying that he has been making all sorts of good resolutions since election day; and they believe that he is going to make a fine record in the next two years. He hopes to profit by the mistakes of the past. He is now in a more independent position than he ever was in and he will reward his friends and punish his enemies. His statement regarding his intention to reform the Board of Public Works is interpreted as a decision to retire Michael Casey to private life, and of course he will dispense with the services of Pin Head McCarthy of the Civil Service Commission, who tried to swing the Building Trades' Council to Crocker. McCarthy is being denounced on all sides as a traitor, and by none so bitterly as by the Phelanites and McNabites. They say that he owes everything to Phelan, who gave him whatever prestige he had in labor circles by manipulating the politics of labor unions in his interest, and that he was expected to support Lane, but that he thought Crocker's election was a certainty, and therefore threw his strength to the Republican candidate for the purpose of holding his job.

His Father's Son

If the old Adam crops out in the young Adam, can he—the young Adam—be blamed? There is truth undeniable in the parents' legacies, and if the son listens rapturously to the cymbals of Sodom and Gomorrah, can he be condemned when pere, now embalmed and doubtless repentant, showed such eagerness for dead sea fruit? All the tenderness, all the gentleness of the mother are unavailing, for the siren who lured the elder by dangling her nether limbs from the walls of the fated city continues to dazzle with the same members the offspring of the once entrapped Millionaire. While she moved her extremities to the rhythm of the orchestra, the lady of experience and fascination cleverly syndicated the golden calf, thereby proving that leg-pulling is profitable. She worked upon the Darwinian principle, waiting patiently for the guinea in the reproduction of the species.

Primoli Is Sore

Count Louis Primoli left New York last week on the Celtic bound for England. According to an Eastern paper the titled Italian was very much disgusted with America and intends "knocking" Americans all over Europe. The Count's first appearance in this country was made in San Francisco, and he left somewhat hastily after I published the story about the gossip in the Bohemian Club anent his request for a list of the maiden heiresses of San Francisco. He was introduced in the Bohemian Club by President Benjamin Ide Wheeler of Berkeley, and after a very short stay here he went to New York. The story of the Bohemian Club incident reached New York about the time of his arrival there, and as a consequence he was not given a very cordial reception. Even the daughters of the multi-millionaires were not enthusiastic over him. But nowadays a nobleman under the rank of a Duke is deemed unworthy of consideration by the representatives of America's plutocracy. Primoli is a man of considerable prestige on the continent, but he would be more popular if he were less indifferent to the virtue of immaculate linen.

No Foreign Swain for Her

Miss Lola Davis, much to the regret of the younger coterie, will contribute but little of her irrepressible buoyancy to social festivities this winter. She is a young woman of unusual frankness and charm, and along with her tendency to rosy embonpoint, possesses remarkable vitality and energy; characteristics of the slender maiden. She emphatically denies all sly innuendo bearing upon the subject of foreign swains, declaring that the native son of the western slope is a nearer approach to her ideal. The three sisters, owing to the recent death of the mother, are living very quietly at their beautiful home. Each daughter is guardian of a considerable fortune in her own right.

Those Tobin Girls

Mrs. Raoul Duval is again to cross the Pond, having decided that the "woolly west" is preferable to la belle France for the winter. Mrs. Duval will leave her two little girls in the care of her husband's people, much to the disappointment of her own family, whose worship of the small scions is an open secret. Miss Celia Tobin, whose engagement has been rumored of late, is, like her sister, a literary dilettante. "The Tobin girls," an Englishman once pedantically remarked, "are immensely clever—best educated women in the smart set, don't you know."

An Exceptional One

Miss Helen De Young is to be with us this winter. If the average debutante substantiated flattery by imitation, next season's list could point a moral and emphatic "Do's" would adorn the book of "Don'ts." The gentle dignity and sweetness for which this young girl is conspicuous are truly remarkable in the epoch of the "young idea," when deference and consideration for others are usurped by the bravado of the newly emancipated, and a breezy slang that possesses all the freshness of the Atlantic without its stimulation. Helen De Young's graciousness and smiles are like wafts from "Araby the Blest;" they are for all that come her way.

Ismon's Resignation

One of the most unexpected and important changes in local trade circles is the resignation of George H. Ismon from the Pacific coast management of the American Steel & Wire Company's interests. This is the more surprising as Mr. Ismon has made a phenomenal record as a sales agent, and just why he should have resigned is not generally known. It is said to be strictly for personal reasons. The attempt of one of the daily papers to make a sensational article out of it and by innuendo cast some reflections on Mr. Ismon is greatly to be deplored. He came here some years ago, a stranger, and by his genial manners and strict adherence to correct business methods has won the respect of all who have met him either in private or business life. It is reported that Mr. Frank Baackes, the General Sales Agent of the company, will arrive here in the early part of November, for the purpose, so it is reported, of inducing Mr. Ismon to withdraw his resignation, and that is what his friends are urging him to do.

"Ringing" on the Turf

Prominent turf men in the East do not believe that the sensational charge that "The Fiddler," who won at long odds at Morris Park, was a "ringer," was disproved. The ruling of the stewards was accepted, but subsequent developments aroused suspicion, and I have been informed by a correspondent that certain shrewd turf operators are positive that the horse that ran as "The Fiddler" was not that animal. The real Fiddler was shown to the stewards in the paddock two days after the race, but the horse that won the race had been surreptitiously removed from the track. It has been remarked that it was suspicious that "The Fiddler" was suddenly shipped to Pine Bluffs, Arkansas, without being entered in another race. There is seldom a season of racing without a case of "ringing" on some track. A horse called "MacNamara" is supposed to be the one that was run as "The Fiddler" and it is believed that he was the "ringer" that won as "Hiram Johnson" at New Orleans last winter. Last June there was what appeared to be a case of ringing at Detroit when a mare named "Aimless" ran under the name of "Sarah Black." A horse called "Frog Dance" was sold to a mysterious stranger about a year ago, for five thousand dollars, and he has never been heard of under that name since. Neither has the identity of the purchaser ever been discovered, but many horsemen believe that "Frog Dance" has participated in numerous ringing cases on obscure tracks.

The Rejuvenescence of Stewart

First it was Senator Depew who experienced the rejuvenating effects of the atmosphere of Washington. Then came Senator Platt, and immediately after his marriage with a woman young enough to be his granddaughter, came the news that our patriarchal friend, Senator William M. Stewart of Nevada (for political purposes) had taken unto himself a bride. It seems but a few months ago that Senator Stewart's wife met with a shocking death in Oakland, the result of an automobile accident. The Senator was then at The Hague arguing the Pius Fund case with Garret McEnerney, and we all sympathized with him over his loss. But how quickly did he become himself again! Depew and Platt become youthful bridegrooms when compared with Stewart who was born seventy-six years ago.

His Checkered Career

Though Senator Stewart has been a picturesque figure in the life of Washington for forty years, he has also been a familiar one on this coast. He has practiced law both in Nevada and this city, and has participated in some very important legal battles before the local courts. He has wobbled about politically a great deal, and it is said that he has lately been losing his grip in the sagebrush State. His career has been a checkered one in finance as well as in politics since the days when he worked with a pick and shovel in the gold mines. He was first elected to the Senate in 1865 and served two terms, after which he came to this city to practice law. He was a gold bug at the time, and continued to be long after he returned to the Senate, in 1887. In 1895 he became one of the most radical and rampant advocates of free silver, and he was most vociferous in his denunciation of the crime of '73. During the campaign he published at Alexandra, Virginia, a free silver paper known as The Silver Knight, but now he admits that he was mistaken in those days. He is a gold-bug again.

His Freak Residence

Senator Stewart has been alternately rich and poor, and at present he is in affluent circumstances. His home in Washington was always an hospitable one. In the '70's he and his wife erected in Dupont Circle a great pile of brick and stone which was known as Stewart Castle, and which became one of the show places of Washington. About two years ago, when he was hard pressed for coin, he sold his home to Senator Clark of Montana, who tore it down because it was so hideous. The hole in the ground was left and is there still, and adjoins the Clark residence. Clark, by the way, promises to erect a mansion on that site which will cause the whole country to sit up and take notice. Senator Stewart has long owned a farm in Virginia, where he spent his leisure hours. He established a dairy business there and widely advertised his intention, some time ago, to serve the people of Washington with clean milk out of clean cows, served from clean cans with clean bottles by clean men out of clean wagons. But the people of Washington appeared to prefer other kinds of milk, for Senator Stewart abandoned his immaculate dairy business.

Contretemps at a Ball

Why, I have been asked, do the society reporters of the daily papers overlook the swell functions in Jewish circles? I cannot answer authoritatively, but I presume that it is because the press agent has not yet broken into Jewish society. The elite of Jewish society have not yet learned the importance of social booming. Or, perhaps they are prejudiced against publicity in matters of a purely social nature. One of the most elaborate functions ever participated in by Jewish society was the Concordia Club ball about two weeks ago. It was an indoor picnic, and several thousands of dollars were spent in giving the ball-room the appearance of a picnic grove. The women were attired as though they were enjoying a summer outing, and the men were freakly costumed. It was a novel affair, and echoes of it are still to be heard. The aftermath of the ball included an amusing story about a contretemps in which young Harry Goldberg figured. His awkwardness in the handling of a bottle of wine in one of the arbors resulted in the spilling of some of it accidentally, much to the distress of a young lady who wore a beautiful gown. Thereupon he became persona non grata to Mr. Blumenthal, the wholesale glove merchant, who made a demonstration signifying his disapproval. It would have been regarded as a trivial incident were it not for the fact that young Blumenthal is popularly regarded as a suitor for the hand of Miss Blumenthal. Harry's brother, Sol Goldberg, by the way, recently returned from Europe, whither he was sent, it is said, to cool his passion for a fair one.

There is a rumor in Jewish society circles to the effect that the engagement of Milton Levy and Alice Weil, daughter of Mr. Weil of the firm of Greenebaum & Weil, will soon be announced. It has caused quite a flutter.

Light on the Missionary

Those good people who are anxious to reclaim the heathen, and who contribute to the cost of propagating Christianity in the Far East, will find much to interest them in "A Tale of Bricks Without Straw," written for Town Talk by a trained and reliable journalist who is now in the Orient. It appears on one of the preceding pages. The correspondent has been making research into the ways of the missionary in China, at my request, and his letters are fraught with interest to all enthusiastic Christians who are quick to respond to the appeals of the professional soul-saver, as well as to those who do not understand why the natives occasionally resent foreign intrusion.

The Hush Row

If the members of the Hush family of Oakland persist in their efforts to separate Will Hush from his wife they will not relish the newspaperiety that is very likely to ensue. They have already provoked quite an unsavory scandal, and among other things a suit for slander is now promised. Mrs. Will Hush has instructed a lawyer to institute the suit, and she says that it will not be withheld unless satisfactory apologies and retractions are made. She laughs at the report that her mother-in-law objected to the marriage because her son was several years younger than the bride. She says that Will Hush is twenty-two years old and that there is no discrepancy between their ages, and in truth Mrs. Will Hush is quite a young looking woman.

The Cause of It All

According to Mrs. Will Hush, the rancor of her husband's parents is entirely due to their ambition. They had hoped, she says, that he would marry a wealthy girl, and they had in their mind's eye none other than Miss Mabel Toy to whom he was at one time very attentive. Though the Hush's are quite prominent in Oakland society they are not rich. Mrs. Will Hush is also authority for the statement that she has been bitterly persecuted ever since the marriage, and that all sorts of schemes have been resorted to in the hope of alienating her husband's affections and making him dissatisfied with his lot. Her mother secured a position for him in the employ of the Southern Pacific Company, but owing to a conspiracy by which he was besieged by creditors he lost his job. One of the bills on which suit was threatened was for flowers sent to a very charming debutante. Notwithstanding the appeals and the threats that have been made Will Hush is loyal to his wife, and he will stand with her against his whole family.

Mrs. Fisk's Gown

The feminine element of the Twentieth Century Club is still discussing the gown worn by Mrs. Katherine Fisk at the Thursday night Duss concert, which was given under the club's auspices. Hitherto the record for decollete cut bodices has been accredited to Madame de Reynier, who shocked the university ladies by her display of neck. But Mrs. Fisk had hers cut a few inches lower than that of the French professor's wife. As the contralto is a woman of considerable bulk, her flesh display naturally caused comment.

Wouldn't Spoil the Punch

That was a fine punch served at the musicale of the Twentieth Century Club last Saturday afternoon. And, by the way, it was responsible for the failure of one of our young society chaps to appear at the Pomeroy tea later in the afternoon. He had intended to attend both affairs, but after a few glasses of the punch he explained to a friend that he would have to forego the coming-out party as tea would be too much of an anti-climax. Surprise was expressed by some of those who attended the tea, at the absence of the debutante's mother. It was explained that she was in mourning and for that reason an aunt of Miss Pomeroy presided over the affair.

Judicious Sentiment

Madame La Bavarde has been saying that Mr. Newhall has so much sentiment about the old Newhall home which stood in Van Ness avenue that he could not bear to see it occupied by aliens and would not turn it into a boarding house as Mrs. Harrison (Mary Crocker) did her ancestral home, so he is having it moved to his new Pacific avenue lot, where it will be completely overhauled and renovated to make a fitting home for the new Mrs. Newhall. It is quite evident that Mr. Newhall's sentiment did not deter him from cutting the home of his fathers in two and seeing it in its dismembered condition slowly moving out Van Ness avenue. The new Newhall lot is expensive but moving the old house will save a great deal of money at the rate workingmen are charging now, and therefore Mr. Newhall's "sentiment" seems to have more than the ordinary amount of solid sense behind it. Mrs. Newhall will not have a new or modern house but it will cost far less than the average luxurious nest a latter-day bridegroom presents to his bride.

She Writes Limericks

The list of Miss Elsie Sperry's accomplishments is a long one. She is not only the most unconventional of our society girls, but she is also one of the most talented. She can do anything from running an electric car to writing a sonnet. She has quite a knack for verse-making, and I hear that she has written some limericks that are superior to those of Mrs. Mumford and Addie Mizner. Some of her friends are enthusiastic over the jingles, and are urging her to publish them.

At the Bruce-Stephenson Wedding

There were some beautiful gowns worn at the Bruce-Stephenson wedding. Mrs. J. B. Stetson was one of the most handsomely costumed of the matrons. She wore a white lace gown over pink silk. Mrs. Silas Palmer, Olive Holbrook that was, wore a pink crepe frock and hat, and Mabel Toy had the real New York air in her white cloth trimmed with sable. Ardella Mills was in white, and Mrs. Sam Buckbee wore a dainty lavender gown. Mrs. Ed Pond was very handsome in a dark costume of smart cut. Miss Harrington wore a modish white gown. The bride's going away costume was a short walking suit of dark blue with hat to match.

A Nuisance that Should Be Suppressed

The sandbagging of merchants in the interest of organizations that are supposed to be conducted for charitable purposes is becoming such an intolerable nuisance, that there is talk among business men of organizing for protection. In some instances money is collected for the maintenance of organizations whose members should sustain their own charity funds, but their subscription solicitors go about as though they represented institutions that the world was pledged to support, and they do not hesitate to resort to coercive measures that savor of blackmail. The store of a Kearny street merchant was invaded by a brace of solicitors last week who demanded a donation of money or a prize for a benefit entertainment, and when he refused they took out note-books and made a memorandum of the name of the firm and the address. Of course their purpose was to convey the hint that the store would be boycotted by the organization which they represented.

In Benedetto's Honor

Though smart society has not rushed the Italian artists at the Tivoli to any great extent, they have been entertained nevertheless, and in charming style, too. Dr. and Mrs. d'Ancona have done not a little in the way of social attention to the grand opera singers, and last Monday Miss Lillian Slinkey gave a musicale at her home in Leavenworth street in honor of Signora Benedetto. The grand opera soprano is very charming in her manner, and graciously passed opinion on the merits of two of Ziliani's vocal pupils, who contributed to the program—Mrs. Wand, a dramatic soprano, and Miss McLae, contralto. The former sang the aria from Puccini's "Tosca" with some trepidation, for this is one of Benedetto's star numbers, but the prima donna appeared to approve the amateur's rendition. Miss Bartyletta played a violin concerto to Mrs. Danhame's accompaniment, and Miss Slinkey and Dr. Bonino sang. Benedetto is a matron, by the way, and her husband is devoted to her. She says that nothing is so pleasing to her as a quiet, domestic life, and she often regrets that she was thrust into the limelight of grand opera. She has some magnificent jewels and wore a pair of sapphires on this occasion that were of rare size and lustre.

The Mash Note Girlie

The "mash note" habit is becoming more firmly intrenched every day, and the Johnnies of the gentler sex are as bold in their solicitations as are the show-girl chasers that haunt the stage door. The writers of "mash notes" are especially susceptible to the soulful glances, fervid acting and passion-strained voices of the swarthy artists of the Tivoli's Italian opera company. Last year they kept De Padova busy having his mail translated, and this year they are on the trail of Ischierdo, the good-looking but rather diminutive tenor. He has fine eyes and lashes which have enthralled some society girls—the same sort of girls whose soft hearts liquified before the glances of Consul-General Ho Yow, the handsome Chinese diplomat, with whom many of them were glad to dine in the private rooms of French restaurants. I hear that Ischierdo likes to receive the mash notes and that he reads their most tender passages to his companions in song. Gregoretti, who is the handsomer, with a far better voice and a great deal more art, never receives any notes. Women always did prefer tenors.

Where Credit Is Due

Some of the religious papers in the Middle West are making a great to-do over the exploit of a Methodist minister who went to work with his own hands and helped build a church. His picture and that of his wife are given the place of honor in the centre of the page, along with that of the building, and the man from Mars might be led into the belief that for a strong and able-bodied man to put his strength to some other use than kicking a football was little short of miraculous. Why doesn't somebody glorify the work of the Spanish padres who labored amongst the Indians of the Southwest and the Pacific coast? They built not only churches but all their other buildings as well, and they were not simple pine or redwood assembly halls, put together from millstuff with nails of assorted kinds and sizes furnished by the keg. The padres had to make their building material, to be the architects of their own structures, and to depend, for what assistance they had, on uncivilized tribes who did not even comprehend their language. They had not only to direct their laborers, but to gird up their cassocks and engage in actual manual labor. It has always been taken for granted that the Missions of California were simply Spanish or Moorish designs transferred to the new soil, but now that they have been allowed to fall into decay until many of them are past restoration or preservation, it has been discovered that, though bearing a close resemblance to the older architecture, they are in reality so modified as to belong to a class of their own. There is nothing very remarkable about driving nails through boards already sawed and planed and laying machine-made shingles on a roof. Some day the whole nation will awake to a proper pride in the handful of educated men who left their homes to labor amongst ignorant savages, to make brick and mortar and mould tiles, and to erect the buildings which marked "el camino real," in the meantime teaching the Indians not only the elements of religion, but a familiarity with agriculture, stock raising and most of the handicrafts.

very proud of his success, and rightfully so, for he has earned the place he holds on the London boards by sheer hard work. Holbrook Blinn always had a wise head on his young shoulders. When he left newspaper work for the stage, he knew that his lack of inches unfitted him for lover's roles. So he made a specialty of character parts. Though his mother's fad is Woman's Suffrage, for which cause she has lectured and lobbied, she was once a very good actress. She played with Sheridan and also appeared as Romeo to Alma Stuart Stanley's Juliet. She has preserved her youthful face and figure to an astonishing degree.

Club Women Breakfasted

Mrs. Isidore Lowenberg's annual breakfast to her friends in the women's clubs is always a successful function. There is not another woman in San Francisco who is both rich enough and generous enough to spend as much as Mrs. Lowenberg does on her club breakfast. The flowers are always the choicest, the menu cards artistic, and the menu the best the Palace chef can cook; there is never any wine. The sentiments in reply to the toasts are usually clever, but this year all the responses did not come up to the promise of the toasts. There were too many essays, too much seriousness and not enough snap. Most women take themselves too seriously ever to become successes as after-dinner speakers. Mrs. Collins, with her clever lines on "The Literary Guillotine," made the hit at the Lowenberg breakfast, and Mrs. Brown was an admirable toast-mistress. One of the toasts, "Rag-Time," drew the following bright lines from Mrs. Ella M. Sexton's muse:

Sing the song of ragtime,
  Twentieth century craze;
How its fetching tempo
  Moulds our modern ways;
How it sets the fashion
  On (or off) the stage,
For songs—or hats—or dramas
  Ragtime's quite the rage.

Borrowed from the darky
  Under Southern moons,
All his happy nature
  Thrills its haunting tunes;
All his griefs or burdens
  At those strains take flight;
Cake-walk done to ragtime
  Just the "coon's" delight!

To our strenuous living
  (A blessing in disguise)
Ragtime calls "Be merry,
  Not so sadly wise!
Drop that anxious frowning,
  Stern old Care beguile;
Here's the round world swinging
  To ragtime's tune—and smile."

Would its spell might banish
  Sundry ills of ours!
Check "high-pressure" living,
  "Rushing" sixteen hours.
Could we step to ragtime's
  Light and merry strain,
Peace and joy were golden gifts
  From Arcady again.

Marie Was a Faker

A Russian contributor to the Fortnightly Review has thrown a new light on Marie Bashkirtseff and the astonishing precocity which it has taxed the ingenuity of writers to account for. Nordau went into the genealogy of the family, seeking out all sorts of facts and peculiarities on which to base an assumption of "degeneracy," and others, following in his lead, have built up a literature of myth to surround the personality of the Russian girl whose journalistic revelations produced such a sensation in their day. This contributor, who evidently knew and admired Marie for her genuine qualities, says the precocious observations and comments which she made at the age of twelve were actually written at a much later date. She simply availed herself of the feminine prerogative of reducing her years, so that she was really between sixteen and seventeen, a period when it is the natural condition for young girls to be on the lookout for Prince Charming. Elsewhere, when, at the confessed age of nineteen, she philosophizes over her brother's marriage, he being of age, she has simply reversed the family order, for she was older than Paul. This explanation is so simple, plausible and probable that the wonder is it has not occurred to any one before.

Are They Really Engaged?

Whenever society gets stumped for a topic of conversation it hits upon the old rumor that Bessie Ames and "Bobby" Eyre are engaged. The rumor bobs up every now and then, and as Bobby and Miss Ames are seen together frequently, it will not down. Now I hear that the engagement is an assured fact and will be announced very soon. Miss Ames has quite an advantage over her reported fiance in size and weight, but they are matched in good-nature. The former is one of the cleverest girls in society. She plays the 'cello divinely and has many times been asked by visiting managers if she would not tour as a virtuoso. She has dramatic as well as artistic talent. "Bobby" Eyre is a nice chap and has loads of friends of both sexes. At one time he was numbered among the wooers of Frances Hopkins.

Mrs. Tevis in New York

Word comes to me from New York that Mrs. Cornelia Baxter Tevis has been received with open arms by the elite of Gotham. She writes glowing accounts of her life in New York, where she has met every one from the Astors and Mills's down. Mrs. Tevis holds her head rather well considering all the attention she has received. Nevertheless she has gone mad on New York society, which is not strange considering she only had Denver and San Francisco society heretofore and not very much of the latter. Mrs. Tevis has made a hit with New York's smart men, I hear, the men who give the cachet to a new beauty. She has been rumored engaged to one or more, but those who understand her say she is merely feeling her way into society through them.

California Club Topics

Mrs. Frank P. Deering will have charge of the program of the California Club on November twenty-fourth. There will be a debate on the question: "Resolved, That the Problem Play is Beneficial to the Play-goer." This should bring out a brilliant discussion, for it is a subject that doesn't contain a dull note. Comments on the Sudermann, Ibsen and Maeterlinck problem dramas, also "Zaza" and the Pinero plays, with Clyde Fitch's contribution to the play library, should give plenty of color to the debate. The California Club, by the way, is to be very active this winter, and any number of interesting events are scheduled. The physical culture section, which has W. Greer Harrison and Captain Sage as its leaders, is particularly enthusiastic. The French section, too, inspires a very lively interest. The members read French literature and discuss what they read.

They are Flocking Together

So many Californians are taking up their abode in Washington Square, New York, that there is talk of changing the name to California Square. Jack Cosgrave and Mr. Stubbs were among the pioneers from this State, and they have a very cosy flat there. The Wallace Irwins and Mrs. Robert Louis Stevenson and her family are located in the same square, and Geraldine Bonner intends taking up her residence there.

Mrs. Pat's Double

Though Mrs. Frank Carolan poses as Mrs. Pat Campbell, and models her gowns after those of the London actress, her only real resemblance to Mrs. Pat lies in her figure. But there is a young woman in San Francisco who resembles Mrs. Campbell, though she does not try to intensify the resemblance by her carriage and costumes. The young woman is Miss Una Fairweather, daughter of Mrs. Mary Fairweather, who lectures to the women's clubs on Shakespeare and Wagner, and of Henry Fairweather, who was once a great Wagnerian opera singer and is spending his declining years with us. Miss Fairweather is a very young girl, not yet twenty years of age, but she is a stunning beauty. She has great blue eyes, black-fringed, and English features, with wavy black hair. She is studying for the stage, but will not rush her debut for her parents do not believe in undue haste in such matters. In the meantime she goes to balls and parties and amuses herself in the usual young girl's way. She has a contralto voice of great power, and her dramatic ability is of an uncommon order. Sandona painted her portrait shortly before he went to Honolulu.

The Buds and Their Program

The buds are joyous because Mrs. Abby Parrott is to introduce her granddaughters, the Misses De Guigne and Donohoe, at a dance instead of at the regulation tea or luncheon. There is no denying the fact that the majority of young girls, and those of older growth, prefer to see a man or two at the functions they attend. Teas are weary things at best, except in ultra-Bohemia where they are rendered interesting by the mental quality of the guests, and the male animal usually fights shy of them. Luncheons are the dreariest functions in the social world. There will be an unusually large number of buds to debut this winter, and it is going to be a hard problem to find dancing men for them. The number of men who are willing to dance grows more attenuated every year. But there will be some charming buds to make their opening plunge in the swim. Mrs. Bowie-Detrick will give a tea on the eighteenth to introduce her niece, Miss Helen Bowie. The latter is a pretty little brunette. Her father is Dr. "Ham" Bowie and her home is in San Jose. She spends a deal of her time, however, in town with her aunt, whose artistic home in Jackson street will now be thrown open for the first time in a year or more. Owing to a death in the family, Mrs. Detrick has not been entertaining. The W. Mayo Newhalls are expected to return from Europe this month, and their daughter Margaret will then make her debut. She has been abroad at school for two years and has a few accomplishments added to her native prettiness.

Movements and Whereabouts

The Sterling Postleys, who are visiting the Clarence Postleys in New York, will return here in about six weeks and will spend a part of the winter in Santa Barbara and at Coronado. Mrs. Fred Green and Mrs. Chauncey Winslow are back from their Portland trip. The latter has been much occupied with the care of her children, who are both ill. Mrs. D. D. Colton and Mrs. Henry McLean Martin will arrive from Washington, D. C., and pass the winter here and in Southern California. Their Washington home will be closed, as there is no reason for having it otherwise.

Mrs. Martin's daughter Katherine will not debut for several seasons yet, and both her grandmother and mother prefer Paris as a place of residence. It is only the state of Mrs. Colton's health that dictated the winter in California.

Mrs. George H. Perry was hostess at a very delightful musicale at her home in Alameda on Tuesday evening. Several guests went over from San Francisco, and there was a large percentage of Adelphian Club members present. Mrs. Harry Curtaz sang by desire the old favorites "Because I Love You, Dear" and "The Rosary," to the accompaniment of the Apollo, played by Mr. Leland Roberts. The latter also gave several selections on the instrument, among them two dainty compositions by Mr. Curtaz. Miss Chapman recited, and there was other entertainment. The affair was in honor of Mrs. Perry's mother, Mrs. F. R. Dray of Sacramento. Mrs. Dray and her daughter Alice are to spend the winter in San Francisco, having taken an apartment at Bush and Taylor streets.

Brother Bob Objected

There was a hitch last week, in the arrangements for the Roxburghe-Goelet nuptials, but now everything is settled, and the wedding will take place on the tenth instant at St. Thomas's church in New York. I have learned from an authoritative source that for a little while a serious rupture was imminent, owing to the objections of Robert Goelet to his sister's marriage with the Duke. The latter had demanded a settlement, and Robert Goelet suggested that he should be satisfied with the income from the bride-elect's share of the estate. But the Duke is a business man and he insisted upon receiving a slice of the principal. Mrs. Goelet finally arranged an amicable adjustment, but not until the nuptials were postponed, and the feeble explanation made that the Goelets were plunged in deep grief by the death of Sir Michael Herbert. But people were skeptical. They could not conceive of grief so poignant that it could stand in the way of Mrs. Goelet's ambition. They recalled that when her husband was dying she gave a luncheon in honor of King Edward who was then Prince of Wales.

An Impracticable Scheme

The school teachers of this city are no longer enthusiastic over their Annuity and Retirement Association. This association has a peculiar history. The scheme originated among the politicians of the department, prominent among whom was the now notorious Nettie R. Craven. The original idea of its promoters was to get an appropriation from the legislature, and to retire teachers who had served twenty years, on half pay. But when they reached Sacramento they found that their scheme was too raw even for the statesmen of a characteristic Californian legislature. They had to modify their plans. Instead of drawing on the State Treasury, they decided to require the teachers themselves to become contributors to the fund, and an act was passed containing the desired provisions. Subsequent legislatures modified the original act, but the plan is substantially the same. From the first it should have been seen that its provisions were impracticable By paying one dollar a month for thirty years, or its equivalent, three hundred and sixty dollars, a teacher was entitled to retirement on an annuity of fifty dollars a month or six hundred dollars a year. That is to say, an investment of three hundred and sixty dollars would produce an income amounting to nearly two hundred per cent annually of the original sum. If this could be realized it would beat oil-wells or a rubber plantation. But as might be expected, the scheme is beginning to collapse. The fund amounts to nine hundred and thirty-nine dollars a month. One-fourth of this sum goes to create a permanent fund, and the remainder is divided among forty pensioners. Of course each one added to the list diminishes the pro rata. The cry is now for more money. A proposition was recently made to double the tax upon contributors, but the idea did not receive a very warm welcome, the teachers seeming to realize that doubling their contributions would only act as a temporary makeshift.

The Host Had Flown

Congressman Victor H. Metcalf, who, the political wiseacres in the southern part of the State say, is being groomed for national Senatorial honors by General Harrison Gray Otis of the Los Angeles Times, had rather a disappointing trip to the southland the latter part of last week. A correspondent writes me that a few weeks ago General Otis invited Metcalf to visit him in Los Angeles, on his way to Washington. He promised to introduce the Congressman to some of the influential politicians of Los Angeles, and to launch auspiciously the Metcalf boom. He also suggested that Mrs. Metcalf accompany her husband, saying that he would like to have both as his guests at the Bivouac, his handsome Westlake home. The invitation was accepted but when the Metcalfs arrived in Los Angeles Otis was not there to greet them. The absent-minded editor was on his way East to attend a meeting of newspaper publishers. Mrs. Otis was home, and somehow she gained an inkling of how things stood and she invited the Metcalfs out to her home and entertained them with a little of her poetry on sunsets, the mountains and the sea. Some one has said, by the way, that Otis has proved himself a model husband by publishing his wife's poetry.

To Wed in Pasadena

Mrs. Robert Harris Ripley, the daughter-in-law of E. P. Ripley, has returned to her Pasadena home to be matron-of-honor at the wedding of Miss Emily Stanton and Ver Picher which is scheduled for the tenth. Her own wedding last spring was the event of the year in the habitat of the plutocrat, and a long string of private cars was furnished by the Ripleys to bring wedding guests from the East. Mrs. Ripley, who was Miss Ada Story, a Mills College girl before her marriage, has taken on some very becoming matronly airs since becoming a resident of Chicago. The Picher-Stanton wedding will be the biggest event of the early fall season in Southern California. The engagement was the result of a girl and boy friendship that began in Pasadena about six years ago. The bride to be is the only daughter of a wealthy widower and the young man is a lawyer with a practice yet to acquire. He has opened offices in an Eastern town to which he will take his bride. His family is one of the oldest in Southern California, and the match was warmly approved by the Stantons, notwithstanding the fact that Mr. Picher is not rated high in Bradstreet's.

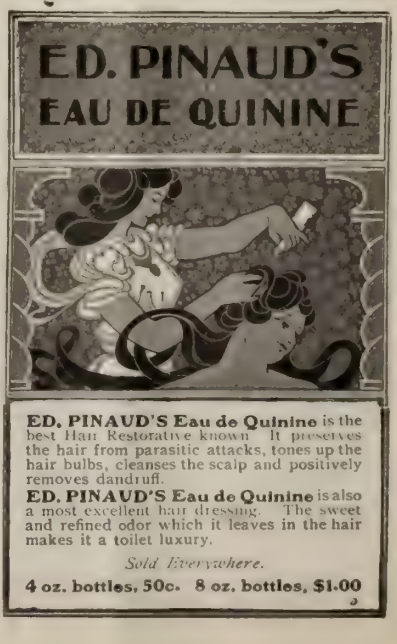
The Gay Divorce

Society women of Los Angeles and San Diego who were forced to be witnesses in the suit by which millionaire John Gay obtained a divorce from his wife on a cross-complaint, are on the verge of nervous prostration through fear that they will have to appear in court again and tell how the old man abused his young wife. One of them is Mrs. Horace Chanslor, who has been confined to her bed since the ordeal and who has declared that she cannot go through it again. However Mrs. Gay's attorneys are planning to reopen the case. Gay says that his wife married him for his money and that he had no sooner got the words of proposal out of his mouth than she ran upstairs and told her father, who promptly came down and said: "I am glad to have you for a son-in-law; loan me twenty-five thousand dollars." Gay says that it was not a case of mother-in-law with him but of father-in-law and that he was constantly being "touched" for large sums. Mrs. Gay says that her husband locked her up in the "castle," as their home was called, slapped her, threw things at her, and refused her a physician when she was ill. The old husband, who posed as a much abused individual, says that her favorite pet name for him was "gray-headed old fool." She is the daughter of P. M. Daniels and the family is prominent in Los Angeles. Both have friends among the society people who were summoned to court to tell of disgraceful scenes in the Gay household.

Proud of His Toupee

There are wearers of toupees and wearers of toupees and their ways are not all the same. One man in particular, the step-father of an exceedingly wealthy heiress, does not mind at all if his friends know that the hair on his head is not genuine. The funny part of it is that his toupee is so realistic that few of his friends knew that it was not the real thing. The other night at his own dinner table he related to an interested party of guests his experience with toupee-makers abroad. As money is no object to him he had a toupee made at each large European city which he visited, and always by the most famous wig-maker of the place. After making a collection of such wigs he discovered that the best made and the most becoming was the contribution of a San Francisco manufacturer. One of the guests looked incredulous at the story and said:

"Oh, that's a joke. I don't believe you wear a toupee at all." Whereupon the host snapped the toupee up and showed a billiard-ball pate beneath.



She Exposed the Leg

The incident reminds me of a burglar story recently told by an Oakland matron. She related that one night she heard a noise in the house and she alarmed her husband, who resolved to go downstairs and investigate. "But," went on the matron, "by the time Charles got his leg on and was downstairs the burglar had departed. But we found a window open." Her hearers all looked their surprise and then the matron realized, to her confusion, that not one of them had before suspected that a slight imperfection in her husband's gait was due to a cork leg.

I hear that E. Avery McCarthy, who has located in Los Angeles since his divorce, has been making money hand over fist. He left San Francisco that he might disassociate himself entirely from the scenes of his domestic infelicity. His little daughter is with her grandmother, Mrs. James McCarthy, who resides in California street.

The Woes of Teachers

Our School Department is being pointed to with pride every little while, because it is no longer under the dominion of the practical politician. And yet there never was a time when there was so much dissatisfaction among the teachers. Never before were there so many exponents of fads drawing fat salaries from the city treasury and making the hearts of the teachers sad. The School Department appears to be conducted now upon the theory that all the teachers are incompetent. Consequently teachers are employed to teach the teachers. When the teachers dismiss their pupils then they become pupils to the teachers employed by the Board of Education which is out of politics and which is therefore a model institution. What an excellent theme for a Gilbertian comic opera!

Some of the Fads

There is one young deputy superintendent employed to instruct the teachers in arithmetic. He has a new way of doing subtraction and fractions, for teaching which he draws one hundred and fifty dollars a month. He has made the important discovery that it is all wrong to teach that a fraction is a part of a whole because it may also be part of a fraction. He is a very wise young man and he amuses the teachers. Then there is an old gentleman who teaches the teachers geography. But the other day he consumed all their time with a discussion of babies, a subject in which the average school-marm is supposed to have no interest. Nevertheless he deemed it advisable to enlighten them on the subject of the involuntary muscles of the wee sma' infant. And all the while the ladies were wondering what those muscles had to do with geography. This same old gentleman is responsible for the new fad introduced into the department, of making maps on the floor instead of on the blackboard. It has played havoc with many corsets and has caused tight-fitting skirts to bag at the knees. Hence the old gentleman has been much execrated.

A Mutiny Threatened

The physical culture fad is also a feature of the curriculum. Walter Magee of Berkeley draws one hundred and fifty a month for appearing before the teachers once in three months and showing them how they should develop their muscles by the ordinary methods with which few people are unfamiliar. Mr. Magee has an assistant who receives one hundred dollars a month to see whether the teachers do their physical culture work properly. Perhaps the severest trial which the teachers have to endure is inflicted by Katherine Ball, who is paid one hundred and fifty a month to instruct them in drawing and dictate the method they shall pursue in communicating the artistic temperament to the young. Miss Ball is an intellectual woman, and she knows how to teach drawing, but the teachers in the lower grades agree that her method is impossible. They say that she expects seven year old children to do work that would tax the skill of an adult who has spent a year in the Hopkins Institute of Art. Indeed I have heard of one teacher who did spend a year there, and who has both artistic temperament and artistic ability but who could not do the work required by Miss Ball, and which she expected little children to do. Miss Ball insists that teachers who do not approve of her are incompetent. Meanwhile the teachers are becoming mutinous. They complain that they are being overworked to no purpose. But meanwhile the faddists are joyful, and the end of the curriculum is not yet. There are two singing teachers who teach the Moveable Do, and there is a cooking teacher who is perfecting the future mothers of the grammar grades in the noble art of making pies out of dough. Perhaps before long the mystery of sock-darning will be elucidated for the benefit of the little ones. The public school is making rapid strides and after awhile perhaps the whole course included in "finishing" seminaries, polytechnical schools and musical conservatories will be added to the one now in use in the grammar grades.

A Chance for Match-Makers

Jennie Crocker is to be presented to Washington society this winter by her sister, the wife of Congressman Francis Burton Harrison. Mrs. Harrison has taken the Morgan house in Dupont Circle, and will spend some of her millions in entertaining. Jennie Crocker will probably add spice to diplomatic society at the Nation's capital, for she is a girl of considerable originality. In looks she resembles her mother, who died at her birth. It was Jennie Crocker who shocked her grandmamma Easton a few years ago by her sage ideas about matrimony. She is one of the three heiresses of the late Colonel Fred Crocker and as her fortune has been swelling through her minority she should be "rushed" in Washington.

Assigned to the New Cruiser

The new cruser Tacoma, which is to go into commission at this port very soon, under the command of "Reggie" Nicholson, will have Harry George as executive officer. Lieutenant George is of the class of '83 at Annapolis and one of the most popular officers in the service. He is well known on the Pacific coast, having served for some years in the Coast Survey, from California to Alaska, where he did much good work.

Landsmen Doing Sailors' Work

Speaking of the Coast Survey, I learn that there is a strong likelihood of that service being absorbed by the Navy Department, as is eminently right and proper. Ever since the Spanish war, when the naval officers were withdrawn from the Coast Survey, the hydrographic work has been performed by the civilians of the Survey, men generally genial and pleasant enough, and good ordinary surveyors, but the merest landsmen. The spectacle of landsmen making surveys and charts and sailing directions for the use of seamen is a grotesque one. I remember once hearing one of the landsmen-surveyors say, "Oh, never mind the hydrography, let that wait. The topography and shore line are the important things."

Neurasthenia in the Navy

Within the last two or three years, the Navy has fallen victim to an epidemic of neurasthenia, which has been assailing its officers to an alarming extent. I noted some weeks ago the frequency with which the Mare Island Naval Hospital has been receiving officers of late, particularly executive officers. John Griffin, John Blish, Charley Laird and others have gone there within a short period, suffering from neurasthenia, and the same story comes from the East. Assistant Paymaster Arthur H. Cathcart has just followed "Bessie" Moale into the New York hospital, although with not so severe an ailment, and reports of others are also heard. The epidemic is attributed partly to the monotony and strain of arduous service on distant stations in the tropics, on modern ships which require far more attention than the old ones, but largely to the uncertainty as to the time of termination of the cruise. The scarcity of officers has told severely upon those on duty, whose sea service has been much prolonged, and one never knows just when he will get back to civilization again. It is said that the mental tax would be much less if an officer only knew the date, even approximately, when he would be returned to the United States.

A Practice that Should Be Stopped

I must confess to ignorance of the nature, extent and application of the pull which governs the passage of civilians of either sex upon the Army transports bound across the Pacific. Clearly, when there is a surplus of accommodations over and above those needed for the troops, there would seem to be propriety in giving the benefit to employes of other branches of the government service bound to or from the islands, but I have noted some peculiar deviations from this principle. For example, I will cite as an instance the Sheridan, which sailed last Saturday. Booked for passage upon her was Mrs. Sebree, wife of Captain Uriel Sebree, U. S. Navy, commanding officer of the Wisconsin, now the flagship of the Northern Squadron of the Asiatic fleet. Sebree having the relative rank of a Colonel in the Army, Mrs. Sebree was assigned a Colonel's quarters upon the transport. At the last moment Mrs. Sebree decided to defer her trip, but not so the two or three young ladies who were to accompany her. They were determined to proceed. The point is, that these young women insisted upon the retention of the Colonel's quarters, and succeeded in keeping them, at the expense of Army officers to whom they should properly have fallen. This practice of subordinating the rights of the very ones for whom the transports exist has gone, I think, too far.

An Official Bug Hunter

Some years ago, I heard Lieutenant-Commander Templin Potts say, in a half-jesting, half-earnest, way, that he thought the Navy should have a corps of dentists and one of chiropodists. Since then, the Army has created a staff of dental surgeons, but it has remained for the Navy to go Potts several chips better in the game of specialism, by the recent determination to appoint in its personnel an official charged with the duty of ridding the vessels of the Navy of cockroaches. The innovation is being hailed with joy by the sufferers from the insects' depredations. But with the appointment have come perplexities. Just what the official title of the new officer shall be, what uniform he shall wear, and what relative rank is to be assigned him, are some of the many problems presented by the innovation. "Chief Exterminator of Nautophile Orthoptera" is definite but awkward. "Bug-Hunter" is crude and vulgar. It has been suggested that he be given the rank of Vice-Admiral, the only grade now unrepresented in the service, but it has been protested that despite the importance and responsibilities of his office, such high rank should not be conferred until the exterminator's prowess has been conspicuously displayed. Whether he shall wear a sword or a syringe is another matter, and when it comes to the question of appropriate collar devices, corps color, and such, the field for ingenuity and imagination becomes a wide one. At any rate, the Navy Department means to banish the bugs.

Fine Art in Table Setting

Every one who keeps house knows the value of a well set table, and every progressive hostess is on the lookout for new ideas. Realizing that a display that contains suggestions would be appreciated, Nathan-Dohrmann Co., on Sutter street, have arranged an exhibit which shows tables, completely set for luncheon, dinner and midnight suppers; every detail is carried out according to the latest ideas and the finest of English and French China, together with Rock Crystal, Silverware, Flowers and Electric features are shown. The dinner tables show complete course sets for soup, fish, game, roast and dessert. The opportunity to note entirely new features and effects used in this display, will amply repay one for the time spent in this interesting establishment. All are welcome to inspect the exhibit.

She's Now in Clover

The lady who was formerly Mrs. Rupert Blue is touring the continent with her new husband in an automobile. The new husband is a wealthy Frenchman with a passion for automobiles and a pride in his skill as a chauffeur. The lady's friends here are not at all surprised to hear that the new husband is wealthy. If he were not he would not be the husband of Dr. Blue's ex-wife. She is a charming woman with the most extravagant tastes, and when she was the wife of Dr. Blue, the curious marveled at the showing she made on a surgeon's salary. Her dressmakers' and milliners' bills astonished the doctor and precipitated the rupture.

General Robert S. Oliver, the new Secretary of War, was at one time stationed in San Francisco. It was shortly after the close of the Civil war, and he was then a young officer in a cavalry regiment. After returning East he resigned from the Army and went into business. He has been a business man ever since.

Inauspicious Happenings Precede a Wedding

Miss Mary Harrington has been overwhelmed by unfortunate coincidences since her engagement. First she was distressed over the illness of Lieutenant-Commander Niblack, who was for a time in a health resort. He was threatened with pulmonary troubles. He was due here from Honolulu on the day originally set for the wedding, but Miss Harrington, fearing that the steamer might be delayed, postponed the marriage a week to be sure to have the groom on time. But the worst of her troubles came when her dressmaker went mad from overwork and anxiety while preparing the large trousseau. Another dressmaker was called to finish the dresses. Lieutenant Niblack, by the way, was at one time quite popular in Washington, D. C., and according to a paper of that city there was a time "when it was feared that he would not heed the advice of the great Apostle of the Gentiles, when he admonished the Christian youth to marry females younger than themselves." "It is said," continued the same paper, "that a maiden whose hair had been whitened by the snows of many winters wore a ring with which he had plighted his troth."

Their Ardor Dampened

There have been rumors of the oozing of the enthusiasm with which several prominent women fostered the interests of the California Eye and Ear Hospital for awhile. No charitable institution was ever organized under more favorable auspices. Brains, money, blood, style and social prestige—all were contributed to promote the welfare of the institution. At the last benefit entertainment there was a copious flow of coin into the treasury, and then came a halt. There has been a great deal of gossip concerning the whyfore. It is to be hoped that the cessation is merely temporary.

Social Gossip From Stockton

Mr. and Mrs. Henry Adams have quite set the pace in entertaining in Stockton the past two seasons. Their reception last week savored of that generous, old-fashioned hospitality that was the proper thing before society ran to diluted teas and "afternoon prize fights"—as a male wag has called the card parties so dear to the feminine heart. When last year the Adams's threw open their new home to their friends and gave them an evening that was talked about for several weeks it was accepted as a matter of course because the affair was in honor of a wedding anniversary. This time the invited ones made up their minds the Adams's like to entertain that way, for as before nothing was spared that could contribute to the pleasure of their friends. Mrs. Adams is one of the most popular young matrons in Stockton and is especially adored by young girls. At the reception she was a picture in pale violet over pink. As she has lovely shoulders and a neck that is a fitting support to the oval of her brunette face Mrs. Adams appears to distinct advantage in evening dress.

The Welsh's left this week to spend some time in Southern California. Mr. Welsh is always too much interested in business to leave home in the summer when all Stockton is away, so his family remains with him and all go away together in the winter. I am reminded that quite a number of the representatives of our older families are likely to be out of town this winter. The Clarys are all to be in San Francisco, and have rented their home to Dr. and Mrs. Wallace. Miss Mabel Thompson, who is a very attractive belle, left on Tuesday to spend the winter in New York. Miss Peters and her young sister, Miss Anna, are apt to be in Berkeley, Miss Peters having adopted language study as her latest fad. With the Welsh's away this closes a number of homes for at least a part of the season that are given over to hospitality and indoor good times.

Neither an Elopement nor a Surprise

My Stockton correspondent writes that the people of Stockton were amused at the way the San Francisco dailies treated the marriage of Mrs. Terry and Dr. Wallace—as though it were an elopement and a great surprise. It was no surprise to anybody in Stockton. It was hinted at in Town Talk several weeks before it took place. It was doubtless to escape all the gossip that the Doctor and his bride-elect settled on a Santa Cruz wedding, to be celebrated in the quietest possible manner. It is seldom that mother and daughter are betrothed at about the same time, and for awhile it was the theme on all tongues. There is still something to look forward to for Mrs. Wallace is planning a big wedding for her daughter, Bernie Terry. It is understood that it will take place in the spring and that Frank West will take his bride to Europe.

The Raising of Rents

The raising of rents for the purpose of increasing the value of property continues in this city at an alarming rate. It was started by the owners of the Blythe block from whom the real estate agents took their cue, and though an early slump has been predicted the market continues fairly firm. The proprietor of Campi's old Italian restaurant, a landmark in O'Farrell street, moved out the other day on account of a raise from one hundred and twenty-five dollars a month to three hundred and seventy-five. Storekeepers all over town are in a highly nervous condition.

Lurline's Lovely Frocks

Lurline Spreckels's gowns always incite the admiration of her San Francisco friends but few of them know that she plans them all herself. Mrs. Gus Spreckels has nothing at all to say in the matter of her daughter's gowns, unless perhaps as to their cost limit. It was the mother's idea for her daughter to learn how to gown herself without assistance and since Lurline was a child of ten she has planned her own frocks and hats. Mrs. Spreckels believed that was the proper way to inculcate taste for colors and effect. Of course at first Lurline blundered a bit, but in the main the experiment was a great success.

Folsom street wharf was invaded by a fashionable and well-dressed crowd on the occasion of the departure of the Sheridan last Saturday. It is always a most depressing and saddening sight to see a liner slowly leave the wharf and watch well-remembered features gradually fade away until they can no longer be distinguished. We were glad to note, however, that several of the officers who were traveling with their wives had the excellent taste and forethought to lay in a stock of Ayala, so that in many instances the pang of parting will be lessened and sea-sickness robbed of all its terrors.

Immorality in the Philippines

From a correspondent in the Philippines I learn that the Islands are a seething hotbed of graft. The merchants of Manila complain bitterly of the rascality of American officials who are operating all sorts of get-rich-quick schemes. Official brigandage is rampant in all departments of the government. Moreover vice in all its forms flourishes throughout the country. It was bad enough under Spanish rule but everybody agrees that immorality has increased at a fearful rate since the American followed his flag. Concubinage is in evidence everywhere, and the mock marriage is an institution which has played havoc with many native women who were deserted by their soldier husbands.

L. P. Latimer's pupils will hold their annual exhibition of water-colors and oils in Maple hall on the twentieth and twenty-first of November. The pupils will hold a reception on both nights, and there will be programs of music and recitations. These functions are annual affairs.

The Dance

The perfumed air now swoons with languid bliss,
Breathing on lovely shoulders, and the sweet
Red mouths of women,—as when lovers meet
To consummate, with fear, their long-dreamt kiss.
In all this throng there is no thought of Dis,
Nor death, nor darkness. Happy glimmering feet
Twinkle to music; heart on heart's a-beat;
Youth knows itself immortal;—yet, I wis,
The stars shall gather in the darkling blue,
When all these lovers have returned to dust;
The moon her stately measure shall pursue,
When all this joy and energy's a-rust;
The winds and waves shall dance in praise of God,
When all this pride is laid beneath the sod.

Answers to Correspondents

F. K. L.—No, I shouldn't advise you to run in two years for Justice of the Peace. The people have seen so much of you in the past year that they might lose their temper if you showed up so soon. Better wait four years and then try for Pound-keeper.

A. R.—No, the triumph of your friend is scarcely a vindication of yourself. True, it was generally known that you were attending to his interests, but he won in spite of that, not by reason of the circumstance.

W. R. H.—Yes, I should say that you are straight on the record once more. No, it is not right to seek to promote your political fortunes by sacrificing your friends in order to placate your enemies. Read the advice of Polonius to his son. It is good intellectual diet, and improves the morals.

G. McN.—No, your status was not improved in the late campaign. You may recall that Mr. Lane announced from a public platform that he was under no obligations to you, and that you could not expect favors at his hands. The inference naturally is that he regarded you as a highly objectionable character. If he did not there would be no occasion to utter words of repudiation. Of course everybody knows that he is under obligations to you, or rather was before you nominated him for Mayor, but that fact only serves to accentuate his own shame in taking refuge behind misrepresentation. Of course, if you are ever seen speaking to him again those who now merely scorn you will have reason to regard you with contempt.

Mrs. M. S.—I believe you. Indeed, before you mentioned it I knew that you had ceased writing social gush for an evening paper. The paragraphs lost their sycophantic and snobbish tone as soon as you started off on your vacation. The pen is a dangerous weapon for some people to wield. It made you ridiculous.

E. M. G.—Yes, it is all right for you to give birthday parties. A society bachelor is permitted to lie about his age.

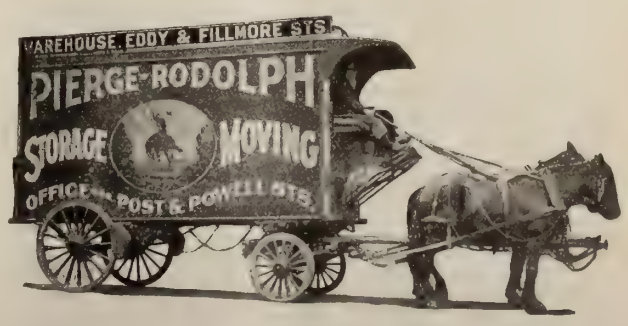
St. Hubert's Day

Last Tuesday was St. Hubert's day, a great day in La-Celle-des-Bordes, France. The feast of St. Hubert is there celebrated by sportsmen and the descendants of the famous hounds of St. Hubert are prominent features of the day. The hounds are brought with the six limiers at their head to the village church, the chief dog wearing the Uzes colors. The huntsmen, in full costume, are surrounded by the pack huddled solidly together, and a San Francisco man who attended last year's hunt at La-Celle-des-Bordes says he never saw a more beautiful sight. The piquers and dog valets use the lash to insure the coupled beasts' patience as they reach through the nave to the steps in front. Before the altar the chief valet holds the six limiers in leash, and at the elevation of the Host the horns joyfully sound the fanfare of St. Hubert. The chimes ring and as the final prayer is read the hunters spring to the saddle. The nrst huntress of France is the dowager Duchesse d'Uzes, who on Christmas of last year counted her eleven hundredth stag. She rents from the French government sixty thousand acres of Rambouillet, the forest near President Loubet's favorite chateau. The Duchesse holds the first "watman's" certificate issued to a woman by the French authorities.



The St. Hubert dogs, which are called Talbots in England and have, I believe, representatives in the Carolan kennels at Burlingame, held the royal favor in France as a race apart until the first Crusades. Then St. Louis, who adored the chase, heard when in the Holy Land of some remarkable hounds of Tatary. He procured two specimens of these, who became the ancestors of the famous "great gray dogs of St. Louis" of which legend tells. They exist no longer save in ancient tapestries, though in 1887 a nobleman from Gers brought to a Tuileries bench show a pack purporting to be the great gray dogs, and they certainly looked just like them. The hounds of the Duchesse d'Uzes have a magnificent pedigree. The white Norman dogs were a cross between the white St. Huberts and the Vendee hounds. M. Baudry d'Asson, the present patron of the Vendean stock, and the Marquis de Chambray whose dogs are pure Norman, assert that their white hounds are the real St. Huberts. The latter have a peculiar note in their bay, a sweet melancholy, and they follow the stag swiftly. In Napoleon III's time the St. Hubert dogs were very popular, but they are rather neglected now except by English breeders. They are dun-colored with very long ears, bloodshot eyes and overhanging brows. They are proud, as becomes aristocrats who were the companions of kings before Charlemagne, and as they are ugly the modern deerhounds are preferred to them in France.

Cultivated Forgetfulness

"Ben Hur"

Remote as we are from the big theatrical circuit with its chain of thriving cities that contribute millions of dollars annually to the coffers of the magnates of the Syndicate, we should consider ourselves pretty lucky when a production of the magnitude and the merit of "Ben Hur" is vouchsafed us. So many big and meritorious productions have found it unprofitable to venture across the continent, and there is so little risk on the Eastern circuit, that it is really surprising that Klaw & Erlanger condescended to send us this big company with its car-loads of scenery and other expensive paraphernalia. The condescension, however, was not indulged until "Ben Hur" was threatening to wear out its welcome in all other parts of the world, for, be it known, this thrilling dramatization of the Wallace masterpiece is now in its third season. That we had to wait so long for it is evidence of the fact that it was making money elsewhere, and even now it is running in New York, for the metropolis has not had enough of it. However, we are very proud of our own excellent judgment in things theatrical, and we do not always accept New York's verdict in re theatrical entertainment. Like the cultured folks of Phoenix, Arizona, and other enlightened burgs, we are inclined to sneer at the decadents of Gotham and deprecate their vitiated taste. When a drama is heralded across the continent as a big New York success, and it opens in San Francisco, we sink into our cushioned chairs in a manner that would indicate that we were defying the actors to make good. Like the Missourian, we demand that they show us. Well, the Klaw & Erlanger people have opened their theatrical package and revealed what appears to be the genuine article. It required considerable ingenuity and technical skill in a playwright to run the thread of the story of "Ben Hur" through a drama without taking any false stitches, but William Young accomplished the feat. He has given us the atmosphere of the story, and he has staged the situations of the book in a way that gives them life. The intensely dramatic incidents of the story are galvanized in the play, and though it is a spectacular drama the human interest of it is not subordinated to the scenery. It is a series of beautiful and thrilling tableaux, the most striking of which is the chariot race, but the story grips you in the beginning, and holds you to the end. And notwithstanding the sumptuous mounting of this costly play, and the hungry attention that has been paid to scenic and mechanical detail, the management has not sought to reduce expenses by economizing on the pay-roll. The company though large is a well balanced one, and there is not a part in weak hands. The cast reveals no great histrionic genius, but it contains several very talented mummers. William J. Kelly does conscientious and cred itable work as Ben Hur, and Alphonz Ethier enters into the spirit of Messala admirably. His performance is marred by some disagreeable mannerisms, but he looks the part of the lustful and villainous Roman soldier. The Simonides of Stephen Wright is an intelligent impersonation, and even John W. Thompson in the small part of Balthasar gives evidence of thoughtful conception. The women of the cast give satisfaction, though the Iras of Miss Nelletae Reed savors a little too much of artificiality. Margaret Pitt plays the mother of Hur in an effectively emotional way, and Julia Herne is a sweet and graceful Esther. The play is to have a run of four weeks and as the advance sale has been large it will no doubt be a financial success. Probably if we are good Klaw & Erlanger will send us their big "Beauty and the Beast" spectacle after they have sufficiently exploited it in the East.

Young, the Dramatist

William Young, who dramatized the Lew Wallace novel, is a graduate of Yale and intended himself for a lawyer. But after his admission to the bar he concluded he liked literature better than law, and decided to take to play-writing. He wrote "Jonquie" which Edwin Booth appeared in, and "Pendragon" and "Ganelon" for Lawrence Barrett. He was also the author of that bright comedy "The Rajah" in which Marie Burroughs and E. M. Pitt appeared under Frohman's management in this city about a score of years ago. He also did the adaptation of "Joan of Arc" that Margaret Mather starred in. Mr. Young is a poet and an essayist as well as a dramatist, and he has some of the eccentricities of geniuses.

Barney Bernard's Mot

The most salient morceau of humor flung at the Monday night audience at Fischer's was a Barney Bernard bon mot. It was interpolated between the acts after the usual premicre floral parade, when the mummers come out to help relieve the ushers of their fragrant burdens. The comedians had made their impromptu speeches, and all the principals save Maude Amber were beaming on the audience. Miss Amber was taking time by the forelock in her dressing room. There was a lull in the proceedings on the stage when Barney Bernard walked to the front and announced, "Mrs. Amber cannot come because she has disrobed." Thereupon the audience acted as though it felt it were being deprived of the only sensational feature of the show. There were calls for Miss Amber but she did not appear until the next act, and then she was unsensationally attired in a white gown. A disrobing scene might add a little ginger to "Rubes and Roses." Even the stripping of the piece of some of its cumbrous humor would enhance the gayety of the thing, without violating the proprieties. No doubt this will be done if it has not already been denuded of much of the material with which the action was insulated on Monday night. There was very little naked humor in the opening performance to excite the risibles of even a most amiable and friendly audience. However, all musical farces go through a process of evolution before they are completely divested of their inanities, and become charged with the quips and gags that insure success. The comedians are a little too much in evidence in "Rubes and Roses." Their dialogue is too long drawn out. That would not be so if it were funnier. There is not enough of the chorus, and the performance is lacking in melodious features. The hit of the performance is made by Georgia O'Ramey, who causes you to forget her name. She does a Cis Hopkins stunt cleverly, and she is the most unobtrusive little person that has been seeh at Fischer's for a long time. The new comedian, Ben Dillon, is an acceptable acquisition to the Fischer forces. He is of the vociferous type.

The Althea sisters, who will shortly appear at Fischer's, are acrobatic dancers who can play parts as well as dance. They have some specialties that are promised to be original. They will begin their engagement when the new burlesque goes on.

are now town talk. Our jewelry has become popular for the beautiful and artistic effect which is not exceeded in the genuine diamonds themselves and are worn by lovers of the beautiful, regardless of their comparative inexpensiveness.

The Alexandra manufactured diamonds are cut and faceted to even a higher lustre than the real stones themselves and may be detected from the more expensive jewelry only by the eye of an expert.

The pearls are manufactured from a composition of fishskin and silver, and are so genuine in appearance as to defy detection.

musical comedies and extravaganzas. When "Peggy from Paris" was put on in New York the Johnnies went wild over the scores of beautiful chorus girls in the production, all of whom had been imported from the hitherto despised Chicago. The critics almost forgot to mention the librettist, George Ade, in their wild rhapsodies over the Venuses from the windy city. It appears that the "producers" of theatrical ragouts in Chicago act upon the theory that pulchritude is a substantial substitute for a multitude of shortcomings. In "The Storks," the latest offering from the Embalmed Beef metropolis, there is a very fetching aggregation of pretty girls. They serve more than the ordinary purpose in a musical farce. They are all vivacious, shapely and breezy Middle Westerners, and they wear spick and span costumes of most becoming color and cut, and when they are all on the stage they present a most attractive picture. Furthermore they can sing and they make the most of the ensembles which constitute the best part of the music. The lyrics are of the Mellins Food variety that never challenge adverse criticism by their obtrusiveness. The humor of the play is distinctly Chicagoese. Miss Alma Youlin, who has the leading part, is a tall, gracefully formed girl with a voice of more than ordinary sweetness. Olga von Hatzfeldt, who has dropped her title, by the way, has a sprightly part which she makes the most of. Her singing with the "Flirty Little Gerty" girls makes quite a hit.

GEORGIA O'RAMEY
The Clever Soubrette, at Fischer's

Alcazar Actors in Farce

James Durkin, whose tender voice made the audience shed tears in the earlier roles in which he was seen, makes them all laugh this week. He is comedy all through from his head to his neatly shod feet, as that champion falsifier of facts, Augustus Billings. He is delightfully insouciant and in the amusing second act of Gillette's farce he never loses his poise. Fred Butler as Johnson is a bit too noisy but the audience on Monday night did not seem to mind that, but laughed loud and long as he wielded his whip and roared to his negroes and to Billings's guests. George Osbourne does his part of the old man, Faddish, with the perfection of artistry, and Miss Starr and Mr. Hilliard are very good seconds to him. Miss Howe and Miss Block are admirable as the mother-in-law and Mrs. Billings. Mr. Maher as the excitable Frenchman is clever. The new company shows its quality in the way it handles this farce-comedy. "Too Much Johnson" is miles away from last week s drama, yet by the easy manner of the principals in the former you would fancy they had been doing farce-comedy all the season.

New Plays for the Alcazar Stock

Considering the tremendous amount of dramatic material required by a weekly change of bill, the Alcazar makes comparatively few revivals. "Too Much Johnson" is almost a classic among comic plays, but it was last seen, previous to this week, some two years ago. It is nearly five years since "The Private Secretary" was done, and the little girls in pigtails and pinafores of that period have developed into full-fledged theatre-hero worshipers, soulful, ardent and frou-frouish. This thing of providing fifty-two plays a year, plays that will draw and entertain, is no trifling problem, but the Alcazar people solve it very cleverly. Their average of novelties is a remarkably good one. For example they are to give us this month the first San Francisco production of a New York and London farcical hit, "The Club's Baby," and the first performance by a stock company anywhere of "A Poor Relation," in which eccentric Sol Smith Russell achieved one of his most lasting successes. Then, too, they have secured "The Way of the World," written by Clyde Fitch for Elsie De Wolfe, and "Mrs. Jack" the Leo Ditrichstein comedy in which Alice Fisher starred last season. Neither has been seen in San Francisco.

Broadway Has No Charms for Him

Ashton Stevens is curious to know why such an actor as George Osbourne is not playing on Broadway. Perhaps it is because he prefers O'Farrell street. This may appear to be a ridiculous suggestion, for Broadway is the Mecca of all thespians, but

ANITA ALLEN

While bringing many important players from the East, the Alcazar management is not neglectful of native talent. Anita Allen, a member of the popular new stock company, is a petite and piquant Californian girl of much promise. She was particularly good as the pert Beatrix Brent, in "Lady Bountiful."

George Osbourne has reached the dizzy height in his profession. He has "made good" on Broadway but he has done better in California. The veteran actor has accumulated a bank account, and his property interests are in this State. It is natural for a man to keep in touch with his property interests. George Osbourne has a very fine ranch in Fresno from which he derives a handsome income, and he has income-paying property in this city. He is one of those unusual individuals, a prosperous actor, and Broadway has neither terrors nor charms for him. He is the peer of the greatest character actor on Frohman's pay-roll. Perhaps we do not appreciate him because we know him so well that it is hard for him to lose his identity before a San Francisco audience. The stock actor is never thoroughly appreciated until he quits stock work, goes away from his intimates, and comes back in a role that he has been playing a whole season. The members of the old California stock company were not appreciated until they became stars. Frank Mordaunt, one of the greatest character actors this country ever produced, was not appreciated when he was playing a new part every week at the Alcazar, although he was then doing his best work. Later on he became a high-salaried Frohman mummer, and then we were pleased to say, "I told you so."

History at the Central

Henry Shumer has the strongest role in "At Valley Forge" at the Central. He has the part of a blustering British officer and he plays it with not a little power. Shumer's specialty is characters of this class, and he is careful never to overdo the villainous side. Elmer Booth also has a role that calls for intelligence, and which gets it, in the Hessian leader. Mayall as the revolutionary hero looks like a page from an illustrated History of the American War. His acting is spirited and is received with enthusiasm. Miss Lawton as the heroine wins the audience from the start. The rest of the company is felicitously cast. The play is beautifully staged. The Central, by the way, is becoming one of the most popular theatres in town. Last Friday evening there were many theatre parties present to enjoy "Uncle Tom's Cabin," and the theatre was packed at both matinee and evening performances Saturday.

'Under the Polar Star"

The Central theatre announces that in the week beginning Monday, November sixteenth, it will produce on an elaborate scale the great scenic and spectacular melodrama, "Under the Polar Star," introducing as a feature the Esquimaux, dogs and general exhibit of Koltchoff's Arctic and Alaska Exhibition, enroute from St. Michael's, Alaska, to the World's Fair in St. Louis. It should therefore be the most notable production of that play that has ever been witnessed.

Some Capital Vaudeville

The lovers of vaudeville have been entertained by an exceptionally sparkling bill this week at the Orpheum. Among the new people, Max Waldron, the graceful female impersonator, is probably the most pronounced hit. His various impersonations are exceedingly clever. The Village Quartet does some capital singing of venerable songs that are always appreciated, and Clivette, the magician and juggler, demonstrates that there is still something new to achieve in his line of dexterous activity. The program is sufficiently varied to appeal to all tastes, and there are few dull moments throughout its length.

The Alexander Recital

Miss Clara Alexander, "sweet smelling of the South," delighted a large audience in Lyric hall last Wednesday evening with her artistic "Dixie Darkie Dialect Recital." She knows them well, these strange midnight children, so unlike us and yet so like; these "images of God cut in ebony." She holds them near to her and sympathizes with them; she holds them away from her and laughs at them and with them, and you laugh, too, or weep. A difficult art it is, Miss Alexander's: she addresses the ear rather than the eye, working without the aid of a Darkie make-up. The heart of the difference between black and white she gives you so happily that you almost understand why you must forever misunderstand your fellow in this dark disguise. Her reading of Paul Dunbar, the poet, is truly admirable. Mr. Willard Young, despite a genuine cold, did much to add to the enjoyment of the evening. There is a promise in his voice well worth keeping. Mrs. Slavan's playing, especially for a Darkie recital, lacked color.

Andrew Bogart's first song recital since his return from New York will be given on Thursday evening, December third, in Maple hall, Palace hotel.

Tyndall's Immense Audiences

Dr. Alex. J. McIvor-Tyndall continues to attract large audiences at Steinway hall every Sunday evening. The attendance at the last lecture was unusually large, the subject being "Spiritualism." It was very interesting and very impartially handled, the object of the lecturer being to give a due amount of credit to what he called "the old spiritualism," for the advanced ideas that are now spreading all over the world. He said that it is to the philosophy of spiritualism that we are indebted for the advanced ideas of the present century, although those ideas came to us under various disguises. He also said that he did not advise the indiscriminate search after mediums, claiming that each person can attract to himself the influences and inspiration he desires, through the magnet of Thought. There were some experiments in independent psychic phenomena, among them being the "dead and alive" manifestation. Tomorrow evening Tyndall will talk on "Hypnotism and Crime,' in which he hopes to dispel some of the numerous misconceptions regarding the power of hypnotism. On November fifteenth he will lecture on "The Elements of Success."

Next Tuesday and Wednesday evenings, at the Macdonough theatre, Oakland, will be given the two festival chorus concerts for the benefit of the new auditorium of the Y. M. C. A. The programs are of unusually fine quality. There will be a chorus of two hundred and fifty voices and an orchestra of professional musicians, numbering thirty-five players, under Pietro Marino's direction. Two movements of Dr. Stewart's "Montezuma" suite will be given.

The Ellery Royal Italian Band Concerts

The concerts of the Royal Italian Band at the Alhambra have been attracting considerable attention. The new leader, Chiaffarelli, is without doubt the best Italian bandmaster that has visited us and the men play with a verve and soul that is positively refreshing. The programs for the final concerts are excellent and include oboe solos by Signor Ferrulo, clarinet solos by Signor Decima and trumpet solos by De Mitris and Palma. Numbers from the "Suite Arlesienne" and "Scenes Pittoresques" are on the program for the Sunday night farewell and compositions by the conductor are played at each concert. The band has been secured for a return engagement beginning December sixth, when an entirely new repertoire will be given and five new soloists now enroute from the East will appear.

Great is Gregoretti

The "little house round the corner" continues with unabated zeal to give you more than your money's worth of music. This week "La Favorita" has been alternating with the double bill, "Cavalleria Rusticana," and "I Pagliacci." The Prologue alone makes one ashamed of sitting in a six-bit seat, to say nothing of a seat for four bits or for two. Great is Adamo Gregoretti of Young Italy. Compared with no matter whom, considered as actor or singer, he is an artist, an Italian who doesn't go beyond the beyonds. His is the voice, his the method, that stand the test of repetition, that grow upon you. Here familiarity breeds admiration. Then you have the delightful de Spada—not quite enough of her; and the dramatic de Benedetto—a little too much of her, at times; and Dado; and—and—well, there is no end of them, and it will never do for me also to give you more than your money's worth.

Mansfield Is Becoming Modest

Just how much of the credit for the success of a play is due the author and how much the actor is a question not easily determined by an auditor. Richard Mansfield expressed himself in a characteristic vein the other day on this subject, and he speaks out of the experience of an artist who has made many plays appear strong which without his inspiration, finish, and life might have seemed rather slim pickings. "Yes, we hear again and again that an actor has made a poor play succeed," said Mr. Mansfield, "but I have never yet seen the cleverest actor make a success out of a bad play. The actor is, after all, but the creature of the playwright, and often receives both the praise and the blame which belongs to the author. On the other hand, my motto has always been, if you will excuse the language, 'Il faut excuser l'auteur,' by which I mean that an actor can give strength to weak lines and bring out meanings perhaps never thought of by the author. But I defy an actor-genius to make a strong situation out of a weak one, or a probable out of an improbable plot."

Mrs. Langtry is coming here after New Year's, to appear at the Columbia. This theatre will have Virginia Harned in "Iris" after "The Storks." "Iris" is one of Pinero's latest, and is one of the problem plays that shocked New York.

Features of Next Week's Bills

By universal demand of those unable to obtain seats last week, the Central will put "Uncle Tom's Cabin" on for another week. It is a magnificent production of the old play, the scenery being the finest ever seen in this city. The colored chorus will sing a new set of southern melodies and there will be a new tableau, "Slavery Days." "Under the Polar Star" will follow. The Alaskan dogs and Esquimaux used in this production arrived from Alaska two days ago. They are going to the exhibition at St. Louis.

Week of Nov. 16th—"Under the Polar Star"

The Tivoli has a particularly attractive bill to offer for the coming week. On Monday, Wednesday, Friday and Saturday evenings the great Puccini opera, "Tosca," is to be presented. This work, which was given for the first time in San Francisco last season, is as the title would imply, founded on the great Sardou drama. Of the Puccini music nothing but praise has ever been heard. The orchestration is particularly brilliant. The title role is to be assumed by Tina de Spada who may be expected to repeat her European successes in it. With Agostini as Cavaradossi, Zanini as Scarpia and Dado as Angelotti the cast will be strong. Zani, Cortesi and Napoleoni will also be included and Miss Phyllis Partington will sing the part of the Shepherd Boy. The production will be a notable one. Alternating on Tuesday, Thursday and Sunday nights and at the Saturday matinee the favorite Verdi opera, "Il Trovatore" will be presented, with exactly the same cast that won such favor earlier in the season. This will be the last chance to hear Gregoretti as Count di Luna and Ischierdo as Manrico. Travaglini's Ferrando is another excellent piece of work and de Benedetto's Leonora with Marchesini's Azucena form a strong combination.

"Ben Hur" will continue for three more weeks at the Grand.

"The Storks" has another week at the Columbia.

One of San Francisco's most prominent attorneys and politicians has written an original up-to-date burlesque of a local character, which will be produced at Fischer's after "Rubes and Roses." All the music, songs and dances are being specially written for the play by one of the city's leading musicians and a composer of prominence, whose works have always found favor with the press and public. The management and stage director Jones claim the burlesque superior to any of the Weber and Field's and that it will be a veritable sensation. In the meantime "Rubes and Roses" is packing the house.

The public likes the Alcazar's change from comedy-drama to farce-comedy. "Too Much Johnson" will see its finish tomorrow night in a gale of laughter. "The Private Secretary," which has had all sorts of stars from Beerbohm Tree to Nick Long, will show John B. Maher in the star role. To follow, November sixteenth, will be the first San Francisco presentation of "The Club's Baby," a comedy which Jacob Litt produced with much success in the East.

Frank Belman and Lottie Moore in a bright new sketch, "A Gallery Goddess," headline the Orpheum's bill. Warren and Blanchard, lyric comedians not new here, have some novelties in their stunt. The Jack Theo trio, novelty and acrobatic dancers, will make their San Francisco debut, as will Phil and Nettie Peters, unique conversationalists. The Village Choir will sing "Come Where My Love Lies Dreaming," "Sally in our Alley," "Songs of Other Days" and other new-old gems. The singing end of the Two Roses will give "My Kimona Queen" for the first time.

At the Chutes will be the original World's Trio, Queen, Stowe and Feely, who are just back from Australia; Wayse and Lamar, singing and dancing sketchists. Lew Wells, the Morriseys, the Allen sisters and Mabel Lamson will remain.

Pinero's Latest

Arthur Wing Pinero's latest play, "Letty," is devoid of Dukes and Lords, but he has given to his chief male character, "Letchmere," a name that is offensively suggestive of the nature of the man, who merely devotes his time to amusing himself with brief liaisons. His Christian name, "Nevill," is that of an English marquis whose family notoriously resembles the description Letchmere gives of his own: "We're rotten bad, every one of us." Pinero, by the way, has written thirty-five plays at twenty-six years, a record that Clyde Fitch will no doubt succeed in beating if his typewriter holds out.

Word comes to me from New York that Charlie Swain, the erstwhile popular comedian of the Grand in the heyday of the Morosco regime, is aching to get back to his old home, and that he has lately been negotiating with the management of the Central.

The fifth annual benefit of the Associated Theatrical Managers of San Francisco, in aid of their charity fund for the sick and needy in the profession, will be given on the afternoon of November twentieth. This is a worthy cause, and the theatre should and doubtless will be packed on the occasion. All the companies playing in town at the time will be represented on the program. —The Playgoer.

MUSIC

[Communications addressed to this department should be received not later than Wednesday noon.]

A Very Poor Concert

The concert given under the auspices of the Twentieth Century Club—the fashionable musical club of the city—is still the talk of society. It was given at the Alhambra on Thursday evening of last week and was one of the poorest concerts to which a musically cultured audience was ever compelled to listen. Though the house was polite, people could scarcely remain in their seats and many left the theatre at the end of the first part of the program. Before the last numbers fully half of the audience had gone. Katharine Fisk, the Chicago contralto, was the solist, and the eccentric Mr. Duss led so badly that the entire orchestra wore a broad grin, to say nothing of leading itself. Mr. Duss has the most extraordinary idea of San Francisco's musical culture—a subject on which we are rather touchy and very proud. For instance, he announced that he had been requested to play an additional number, and, as several people rather pointedly left the house just then, he announced rather sarcastically that the number would take but ten minutes. Had he announced the name of the selection the rest of the people would have left for the selection was the William Tell overture, which he played rather worse than the thousand other leaders who have played it in San Francisco before. Duss evidently thought we had never heard the overture before. Another slap at San Francisco's musical culture was taken by Franko, who played for two encores, Moszkowski's "Serenade," and played it badly. As for Mrs. Fisk, she was impossible. Her gown was cut so low in the neck that even the men were shocked and the women looked away lest some dreadful thing should happen. She had a cold which fogged the one or two good notes in her voice and she was singing wretchedly. On her last visit she did not sing to large houses and was considered rather ordinary, but this time she was infinitely worse. Her first numwas from "Samson and Delilah," and her second was another red rag in San Francisco's already blood-shot eyes—Goring Thomas's "Summer Night," which has been hauled over the coals at a hundred concerts these last ten years. People could scarcely believe their ears that she was actually going to sing this old thing for one of her principal numbers. Her encores were trite, too, and were all things she had sung last year. "There Was an Ancient King" she sang quite well, but not well enough to make one forget Mrs. Henschel, and "Sail, Baby, Sail" is sung far better by local vocalists to fame unknown, yet the critics of the dailies called her "velvet-voiced," and did not dare to tell the truth of a concert which disgusted everybody and bored them to extinction.

The Illness of Greig

Grieg's health, according to a writer in The Academy, is still causing his friends considerable anxiety, despite all the care of his devoted wife. The composer has left his summer home, near Bergen, for Christiania, where he will spend the winter, but for some months he has been unable to do any serious work. For several summers he has hoped to go to London to produce the pianoforte concerto which he was long ago commissioned to write for the Philharmonic Society, but he has not been able to accomplish it.

A Brilliant Performance

Those who were fortunate enough to be present at the faculty recital of the California Conservatory of Music on Thursday evening enjoyed a rare treat. The playing of Mr. Landsberger and Mr. Bendix left nothing to be desired. The program consisted of Raff's Chromatic Sonata for piano and violin, followed by Beethoven's Concerto in G, Mrs. R. N. Alwyn at the second piano. Both numbers were exquisitely performed, Mr. Bendix's runs being like strings of matched pearls. In the concerto one who had only ears and no eyes would never have guessed there was a second piano, so perfect was the accord between the two performers.

The entertainment committee of the Y. M. C. A. promises some excellent musical attractions for the season. The course opens next Friday evening with a concert by the Minetti String Quartet—Giulio Minetti and E. Lada, violins, Charles Tranor, viola, and Arthur Weiss, 'cello. In January will come the Fisk Jubilee Singers and in March the Mozart Symphony Club of New York. In this club is Herr Hoch, the possessor of a famous golden cornet set with precious stones, and a Roman trumpet five feet in length.

Miss Lillian Myers, a former San Franciscan, has returned to her Portland home, a correspondent writes me, and her friends there are very eagerly awaiting her first appearance in recital. She will give a concert on December seventh. Miss Myers spent six years in Europe in the study of violin, her masters being Joachim, Halir, Anton Witek and Remy. She says that though Berlin is the best place for study Paris is the city for finish and for developing individuality. She played in various salons of prominent Parisians.

Mrs. Briggs's Recital

On Thursday evening, November twelfth, in Century hall, Mrs. Wallace Wheaton Briggs, mezzo-soprano, will give a recital, assisted by Dr. H. J. Stewart and Paul M. Friedhofer, 'cellist. The program will be: Sea Pictures (three songs), Edward Elgar; Andante and Finale from Goltermann's Concerto in A minor; recitative and aria from Tschaikowsky's "Joan of Arc"; "A California Night," words by Homer Henley, music by H. J. Stewart, with 'cello obligato; Romance, Svendsen, Allegro Appassionato, Saint-Saens; four songs by Arthur Foote—"The Rose and the Gardener," "Come Back to Me, Beloved," "If Love Were What the Rose Is," "Ashes of Roses"; three songs by Jessie Gaynor, "The Discontented Duckling," "The Gingerbread Man," "The Slumber Boat."

The King's Daughters' Home for Incurables will be given a benefit concert next Thursday evening, in Steinway hall. The artists are Misses Gertrude Wheeler and Millie Flynn, Homer Henley and Mr. Onslow, Miss Tharp, reader, and Miss Julia Tharp, accompanist.

Manager Friedlander already reports any number of inquiries about the Patti concerts, which will be given early next year. Madame Patti appeared in New York last week and scored the expected triumph.

"Babes in Toyland"

An occasional correspondent writes me from New York that "Babes in Toyland," a musical extravaganza now running at the Majestic, promises to be the most profitable production that the theatre-goers of Gotham have ever witnessed. It embodies the better elements of various forms of entertainment. It is melodrama, tragedy, comic opera, grand opera, burlesque, pantomime, vaudeville, comedy and ballet blended so nicely that nothing seems to have been dragged in, and every scene appears to be essential to the development of the plot, which is coherent from start to finish. These are the words of the song that has made the hit of the piece:

"If a steamship weighed ten thousand tons,
And sailed five thousand miles,
With a cargo large of overshoes,
Of carving knives and files;
If the mates were almost six feet high,
And the bo's'n near the same,
Would you subtract or multiply
To find the Captain's name?

Chorus:
"Put down six and carry two;
Gee! but this is hard to do:
You can think, and think, and think
Until your brain is numb:
I don't care what teacher says,
I can't do the sum.

"If Harold took sweet Imogene
With him one eve to dine,
And ordered half the bill of fare,
With cataracts of wine:
If the bill were thirty-ninety-five,
And poor Harold had but four,
How many things would Harold strike
Before he struck the door?

"If Clarence took fair Gwendolin
Out for an auto ride,
And if at sixty miles an hour,
One kiss to capture tried
And quite forgot the steering gear,
On her honeyed lips to sup;
How soon could twenty men with brooms
Sweep Clare and Gwenny up?

"If a woman had an English pug,
Ten children, and a cat,
And she tried in seven hours to find
A forty-dollar flat,
With naught but sunny outside rooms
In a neighborhood with tone,
How old would those ten children be Before they found a home?" —The Music Critic.

In Financial Circles

There has been a little more animation at the Stock and Bond Exchange. While the volume of business has not increased to any appreciable extent, there has been a better inquiry indicating a reawakening interest in the investment market. Transactions aggregate, $117,000 bonds and 2,289 shares of stock, divided into 625 shares, Gas & Electric, 438 shares Spring Valley Water, 456 shares miscellaneous stocks, 710 shares Sugar stocks and 60 bank shares.

There are no developments in the lighting situation. Spring Valley Water has been weak on account of the municipal election. A sensational decline of about $3.00 a share took place in the Alaska Packers' Association; as usual various reasons to account for it were rumored, all of which on investigation turned out to be baseless. Sugars remained steady with a fair demand. Rumors about an impending assessment on one of the oldest corporations are firmly denied by the directors.

The rate of interest asked by lenders is unchanged and money remains in fair supply. The Financier.

Nordica's Hand Read by Livorno

Some years ago Madame Livorno, the palmist and crystal gazer, had the pleasure of reading the hand of Madame Nordica. And last week, when Nordica was in San Francisco, she immediately sent a message to her to come and see her. The palmist took an imprint of the great soprano's palm and found in it several new things. Nordica's magnetic personality is mirrored in her hand; that magnetism that causes thrills to permeate the vertebrae of even the unlearned in music. The singer's hand, Madame Livorno says, is a combination of the artistic and practical, a very unusual combination in artists; the other notable exception being Sousa, the march king. Much ambition would overcome any obstacles, and Nordica has wonderful ambition, with the strength that assures success. Madame Livorno's new apartments at 34 Kearny street are very convenient and central in location. Her phone number is Black 2435.

"My Favorite Bookshelf"

Though Charles Josselyn does not pose as one of the literati, he has made two excellent contributions to literature, in neither of which does he obtrude his personality or even his individuality. Mr. Josselyn is a collator, and as such he is deserving of great credit for his taste and discrimination. To him we are indebted for "The True Napoleon," a work that presents the life of the great Corsican in well chosen selections from the best biographical and analytical sketches, and now we have a very entertaining volume from the same industrious individual entitled, "My Favorite Book-Shelf." As the collator says in his preface, it is for "the use and enjoyment of busy people." That is the pretext for the publication and it is a worthy one. The selections are gleaned from the works of many of the best writers, and are evidence of many years of attentive reading. I do not commend the judgment that appraises the platitudes of Ouida so highly as to deem them worthy of reproduction in a volume that gives hints to the genius of Balzac, Chesterfield, Hugo, Macaulay, Montaigne and Rousseau, but there is such an abundance of brilliant thought in the book that one need not be bored by the mediocrity represented therein. It is a neatly printed volume from the press of Paul Elder and Company and has sufficient to recommend it for the average library shelf.

Some Stories Worth While

The "Little Stories" contributed to the Century Magazine a few years ago, by Dr. S. Weir Mitchell, with some additions which bring the number up to thirteen, have been collected into a volume, and a very welcome volume it makes. Some of the contributions are little more than impressionist sketches, but an impressionist sketch from the pen of Dr. Mitchell is often a better picture than the elaborate work of others. Those who are familiar with "Dr. North and His Friends" and "Characteristics" will readily recall the manner in which Dr. Mitchell can introduce a problem in moral philosophy under the guise of a story. One of the tales in this volume, "Two Men," puts before the public plainly and accurately the difference in the prospects of the honest workman just out of a hospital and in need of shelter until he could find work, and the sickly sentimentalism which provides all things for the ex-convict. It was copied widely at the time and brought about the establishment of a much-needed charity for the worthy but unfortunate sick poor. "A Dilemma" also excited interest, but this time it was the scientific journals which were attracted to the discussion of the problem presented. "Thou Art the Soul of Thy House" is a psychological study. One may not believe, like Secton, that some houses are lucky and some unlucky, or that there is moral danger in living in a house where murder has been committed, but none of us can escape the acknowledgment that there are at least curious coincidences in the fatalities which befall successive inhabitants. Within the radius of a few blocks I know of one house which seemed to have an attraction for cripples, family after family, some half-dozen or more, who inhabited it, each having one or more of its members deformed or crippled; in another there was a succession of sudden deaths; a third, a somewhat pretentious mansion erected by a well-known gambler for his irregular menage, passed from one owner to another, but always there was some taint of scandal in connection with its inhabitants, while a fourth place seemed to foredoom every one who owned it to business reverses. The theory of "influential memories" is, if not convincing, at least interesting. There are but one hundred and nine pages of these "Little Stories," but they furnish more food for thought and reflection than most volumes padded out to five hundred. A most attractive little volume it makes, too, in neat, dark cloth binding with gold decorative design. Published by the Century Company.

Fernald's Sea Stories

Chester Bailey Fernald has at last collected his sea stories, and those who made the acquaintance of Clarence O'Shay and Sudden Lannigan long years ago under the "Lights of Sitka" will be glad to have the chronicle of their deeds and doings between the covers of a book. Lannigan is a sort of Mulvaney afloat, and poor, lubberly, good-natured, soft-hearted Clarence, fresh from the farm, sees in him a mentor much to his liking, when he found himself aboard a real man o' war, which was, small wonder, "a bewildering bedazzlement to him." Nature had not been kind to Clarence—Clarence O'Shay—the name itself is a description—"squat, with two little bandy legs, and the look of a milestone," but Clarence is anxious to make a good impression on the other sex, hence the other "bewildering bedazzlements" which befall him. The stories are not consecutive nor connected, but there is a thread running through them which makes each explanatory of some other and serves to bind the whole together. "The Yellow Burgee" is a story of the Spanish war and yellow journalism, and a good, stirring tale it is, too, and "A Yarn of the Pea Soup Sea" goes to the other side of the earth and gives a fanciful but perhaps not an altogether untrue view of the corruption of the Chinese navy. On every page the book fairly bristles with taking bits of description, whole pages condensed into words. There is the missionary, "with a look like the taste of bad medicine," and the chaplain to whom "the department sent his resignation for being such favorites with women," and the beautiful half-caste Siwash, whose "eyes were India ink and her face the dimensions of a plum, with skin like ten dollars in gold. We was all worrying at the fine lines of her, which was like the figure 8." It takes a San Franciscan to appreciate the force of "Ye brass old Cogswell image." "Me opinion of philosophy," says Clarence, "is henceforth, to leave it alone. 'Tis entire too apt to blow up—with yourself on board," which is as true for the rest of us as for him. "Under the Jackstaff," which is the title under which the eleven stories are published, will please most men and some women. The sentiment, of which there is abundance, is less on the surface than in Mr. Fernald's Chinese tales, and for the most part they will appeal to a different audience, but it is only the ultra-fastidious who can afford to neglect them. Published by the Century Company.

An Eastern literary editor, in announcing a new book by Bram Stoker, refers to his "Dracula," "which is pleasantly remembered." Any one who could call "Dracula" a pleasant book would enjoy a garden party in a graveyard. Weird and uncanny it is, and of a compelling interest. Fascinating in its way, and for those unfortunate mortals who have no imagination to carry the ghastliness on further than the author has done, or those whose nerves are either minus quantities or well under control, there is a degree of satisfaction to be derived from the perusal, but it is after the manner of that to be obtained by assisting at the execution of a post mortem examination. It is doubtful if any one has ever read the book twice, nor is it necessary that any one should. Once read it can no more be forgotten than the right hand or the way home, but any one who could characterize "Dracula" as a pleasant book would be capable of giving it to the children.

Professor L. A. Sherman has demonstrated to the satisfaction of his readers, as well as to his own, that there is a mathematical limit to the number of words put into sentences by different authors, as well as to the number of predications in the sentences. By actual count he has shown that writers fall into a habit of mechanical construction, using approximately a certain number of words to express their ideas, and departing from it only within well-defined limits, so that in case of uncertainty as to authorship the number of words in each proposition and the number of predications in each sentence may be made an important factor in determination. Applying the test to the controversy over the authorship of Shakespeare's plays, Professor Sherman finds that Shakespeare used, on an average, fewer than thirteen words to a sentence, and that thirty-nine per cent of his sentences are simple. Bacon, on the other hand, made his sentences thirty-nine and fifty-nine one-hundredths words long, and in his acknowledged works only fourteen per cent of his sentences contain but a single proposition. Of course this does not decide anything. It is only one more straw laid on the load which the indifferent public is asked to bear. —The Bookworm.

Automobile Topics

There is hardly a doubt but that after the races of the horseless carriages at the Ingleside track this afternoon the second meet of the Automobile Club of California will be declared the biggest and most successful affair of its kind ever held west of Chicago. The meet does not lack talent and all conditions are favorable for a successful event.

Barney Oldfield, the American automobile champion, arrived in this city the early part of the week with his two specially built racing cars, the Baby Bullet and Bullet No. 2, the steam vehicles that have won fame for him. Oldfield is here to break records and declares he will not leave until he has lowered the record for a mile. Oldfield held the mile record until last Saturday, when W. Gould Brockaw lowered it at Brighton Beach.

Mr. L. L. Whitman, who recently made the run in an Oldsmobile from San Francisco to Portland, Maine, is now in Pasadena. The machine cyclometered about five thousand miles in its journeyings, more than one thousand of which were across desert and mountainous country. After the completion of this run Mr. Whitman ran the same machine in the endurance run from New York to Pittsburg via Buffalo and Cleveland. The run from San Francisco to Portland was made in forty-eight and one-half days, and from New York to Pittsburg in eight days. Mr. Whitman was one of the blue ribbon winners and cleaned out every machine but one in his class. The success of the transcontinental and Pittsburg runs was so satisfactory to the Oldsmobile Company that they presented Mr. Whitman with a check and a new machine in addition to his regular traveling expenses while on the road.

The Pioneer Automobile Company is in receipt of a letter from J. B. De Jarnett, cashier of the Farmers' and Merchants' Bank in Colusa, who recently purchased a Stevens-Duryea automobile, reading as follows, viz: "My son just returned from a trip covering one hundred and seventeen miles without stop or accident of any kind, and the machine came in without weakness anywhere." This is an average letter now being received from automobile customers. Neither Mr. De Jarnett or his son has ever had previous experience with an automobile, and it is very evident that the automobile has reached a degree of perfection which will stimulate the purchasing of machines.

Last Sunday O. D. MacNabb of the Western Automobile Company was chauffeur on a trip suggested by Henry H. Davis. The party of four left this city at ten a. m. in a Cadillac. The trip was made to Mr. Davis's ranch, fifty-two miles in all from San Francisco, and eighteen miles from Redwood City, and included a run over King's Mountain, seventeen hundred feet above the sea level, a steep grade of nine miles long. Lunch was taken at Redwood City. The run over the mountain was made in forty-five minutes.

Quite a delegation of autoists toured from Yolo county to this city to be present at the race meet. Among the automobilists were Dr. Fairchild, W. W. Vickery, Mr. Boyle and Dr. Blevine, and these gentlemen made their headquarters at the National Automobile Company, which firm extended the courtesy of its garage to all its customers over California.

C. S. Middleton has purchased from the National Automobile Company the four-cylinder Toledo car which arrived here a week ago yesterday. The vehicle is finished in red with a canopy top and is considered one of the handsomest cars that ever came to the coast. The Toledo is the car which won highest honors in the Eastern Endurance run, traveling seven hundred and ninety-five miles with a loss of only a dozen minutes.

Seven carloads of White touring cars are en route to the Pacific coast, is the report given by the White Sewing Machine Company. Four of these carloads are bound for this city, two for Los Angeles and one for Portland. The majority of these steam cars are already sold on advance orders.

The National Automobile Company entered three machines in the automobile races. Bert Saunders competed in a Toledo, Caesar Luckhardt in a Rambler and E. Courtney Ford in a Franklin.

Mr. Robertson has returned from Del Monte in his Winton touring car.

Miss Georgie Strong drove her Stevens-Duryea one hundred and four miles last Sunday.

W. Parker Lyon of Fresno is the guest of the National Automobile Company.

A. A. Moore Jr.'s four-cylinder Locomobile is here.

Salmon (as Trustee), Louise Emile Salmon, Francis Salmon, Alfred Salmon, Eleanora Alexandrina Salmon, Joseph Reavilo, also known as Jose Raviolo, otherwise known as Jose Raviola, Jean Marcellin Pourguery, Tomas Pidello, Guillaume Pache, Jean Pache, Gaspard Sadony, Eleonora O. Salmon (Executrix of the Last Will of Francis Salmon, Deceased,) John Doe, Richard Roe, James Black, Mary Green and Mary Doe, also all other persons unknown, claiming any right, title estate, lien or interest in the real property described in the complaint adverse to Plaintiff's ownership, or any cloud upon Plaintiff's title thereto. Defendants

Action brought in the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and the Complaint filed in the office of the Clerk of said City and County of San Francisco.

The People of the State of California send Greeting to:

A. C. Freese (Administrator of the Estate of Pierre Langaron (deceased), Eleanora O Salmon, Eleanora O. Salmon (as Trustee) Louise Emile Salmon, Francis Salmon, Alfred Salmon, Eleanora Alexandrina Salmon, Joseph Reavilo, also known as Jose Raviolo, otherwise known as Jose Raviola, Jean Marcellin Pourguery, Tomas Pidello, Guillaume Pache, Jean Pache, Gaspard Sadony, Eleanora O Salmon (Executrix of the Last Will of Francis Salmon, deceased) John Doe, Richard Roe James Black, Mary Green and Mary Doe, also all other persons unknown, claiming any right, title, estate, lien or interest in the real property described in the complaint adverse to Plaintiff's ownership, or any cloud upon Plaintiff's title thereto

YOU ARE HEREBY DIRECTED to appear and answer in an action entitled as above, brought against you in the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, within ten days after the service on you of this Summons—if served within this County; or within thirty days if served elsewhere.

And you are hereby notified that, unless you appear and answer as above required, the said Plaintiff will take judgment for any money or damages demanded in the complaint as arising upon contract or he will apply to the Court for any other relief demanded in this complaint.

That the property involved in and affected by said action is described as follows, to wit:

All that certain lot, piece or parcel of land, situate, lying and being in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, commencing at a point where the Northerly line of Union street intersects the Easterly line of Dupont street; thence running Easterly along said line of Union street Twenty-three (23) feet; thence at right angles Northerly Thirty-four (34) feet and four and one-half (4½) inches thence at right angles Westerly Twenty-three (23) feet to the said Easterly line of Dupont street, and thence Southerly and along said line of Dupont street Thirty-four (34) feet and four and one-half (4½) inches to the point of commencement.

That the object of said action is to obtain a judgment and decree of the above entitled Court adjudging and determining that the above named defendants and all other persons claiming any right, title, estate, lien or interest in the real property described in the plaintiff's complaint adverse to plaintiff's ownership or any cloud upon plaintiff's title thereto have not, and that none of them has any estate, right, title, lien or interest whatever in or to said real property, or in or to any part or parcel thereof, and that the title of plaintiff is good and valid, and that said defendants and all of said persons unknown as aforesaid be forever enjoined and debarred from asserting any claim whatever in or to said real property, or in or to any part or parcel thereof adverse to the plaintiff, and for such other, further and additional relief as to the Court may seem meet and proper in the premises, and for costs of suit.

STORIES OLD AND NEW

Of Her Own Family

During the early settlement of Oregon territory the Cayuse Indians were quite menacing in their demonstrations of hostility to the little band of pioneers—so much so indeed, that at a meeting of the settlers assembled to consult the means of safety, it was resolved to send two of their number across the mountains, to implore aid from the parent government. Colonel Meek and Squire Eberts were appointed, and they accordingly set out for Washington, across the mountains and the deserts, and in due time reached their destination. While there the Colonel was invited to a levee given by some one of the notables of the Administration. During the evening he was introduced to a fascinating woman who made inquiries about Oregon and the hostile Indians, which gave him a great chance to indulge in his favorite spread-eagle style, which he did to the best of his ability. During the conversation the lady inquired if he had a wife; to which he replied affirmatively.

"Why," said the lady, "I should think she would be so afraid of the Indians!"

"My wife afraid of the Indians!" exclaimed the Colonel, "why, madam, she is herself a squaw."

The Last Trump

Charles Dickens rarely attempted a pun, for he condemned that form of wit. But on one occasion he was accused of irreverence in making one. A game of whist was going on and one of the ladies who was not playing took a slight nap in the background. As the last trick of the game one of the party banged down the king of trumps in such loud glee as to awaken the sleeper, who started up scared and bewildered. Dickens turned around laughingly and said:

"Don't be alarmed, but you look awfully like one of the defunct on the Day of Judgment."

"Why?"

"Because you were awakened by the sound of the last trump."

Her Photos Distanced

The late Thomas Nast was once asked by a society woman to make a cartoon for her. He complied with the request, only to discover that she evidently did not understand the mission of a cartoon.

"I'm not a very beautiful woman, am I?" she said to the artist, looking at his sketch.

"Beautiful! That's no word for it! You are really more wonderful than your own photographs, let alone my cartoon," replied Nast.

His Business Acumen

Garrick, in order to cover his own stinginess, is said to have spoken of his partner Lacy's love of money; and Murphy asked:

"Why on earth doesn't Garrick take the beam out of his own eye before attacking the mote in other people's?"

"He is not sure," replied Foote, "of selling the timber."

THE INCOMPARABLE WHITE

Again Demonstrates Its Unequaled Reliability in the New York to Pittsburg Endurance Run Just Completed

WHITE STEAM TOURING CARS

repeated the successes achieved in every previous endurance and reliability contest. Of the NINE cars which arrived at the various garages each night by midnight (of the THIRTY-FOUR which started), TWO WERE WHITES. Webb Jay's WHITE was the first to arrive at Binghampton, Buffalo, Youngstown and Pittsburg, and the second at Cleveland and Erie. Paul Deming's WHITE finished among the leaders each day, demonstrating that the WHITE, in addition to being the most reliable car ever designed, is faster than more costly gasoline machines. IN ADDITION to the two competing cars mentioned above, a WHITE pilot car preceded the contestants, and another WHITE, driven by an amateur, accompanied them, making FOUR WHITE CARS to complete without mishap the arduous journey, a RECORD UNAPPROACHED by any other machine.

The White Made a Similar Record in the Recent English Reliability Trials

In the one thousand mile trip extending over a period of eight days, one WHITE made seven "non-stop" or perfect runs and one run with a loss of less than five marks. The other WHITE car made five perfect runs, two with losses of less than five marks and one run with a loss of slightly over five marks. In the hill climbing contest the WHITE climbed a grade averaging 8.5 per cent., 3,960 feet long, at a speed of 13.63 miles per hour. In the speed contest the WHITE traveled at 33.58 miles per hour with full equipment and full complement of passengers.

These performances of the WHITE were superior to those of the great majority of foreign cars costing three or four times as much as the WHITE, and by far the best record of any American car.

Why Amend the Charter?

Since the re-election of Mayor Schmitz there has been discussion among disgruntled politicians of the advisability of amending the Charter. They argue that it has been demonstrated that the Charter invests the Mayor with too much power. It is somewhat early to begin tinkering with the city's organic law. Everybody knew before its adoption that it would invest the city's Chief Executive with great power. And it was for that very reason that it was recommended by its sponsors. It was admittedly the purpose of its framers to concentrate responsibility, which was so scattered under the Consolidation Act as to be responsible for all our misgovernment. It was contended that the people exercised very fine judgment in electing a Mayor, and that they would never elect to that important office a man in whom they could not repose implicit confidence. It was also said that as the Charter fixed responsibility so clearly the Mayor would be very cautious in the performance of his duties. Among other things it was predicted, by the optimistic exponents of the science of municipal government, that the Charter would interdict the Police and Fire departments from engaging in practical politics. Indeed, the Charter was expected almost to compass the millennium. And now, though it has been in operation less than four years, there is talk of amending it by striking out the provisions that were formerly believed to constitute its chief charm. It is evident that the people who were disappointed by the re-election of Mayor Schmitz are not accustomed to philosophical reflection. It is absurd for them to imagine that they can approximate perfection in municipal government. Whatever be the system adopted there must always be more or less dependence upon the men called upon to administer the laws. It is an axiom of political philosophy that no political forms can be an effectual security against unwise and mischievous exercises of the powers of government, unless public opinion is enlightened and public conscience is awakened. If the public opinion of San Francisco were enlightened and its public conscience awakened there would be no occasion to grumble over the miscarriage of the Charter, for then Mayor Schmitz would not dare subordinate the interests of this city to the private enterprise of an aberuef.

Schmitz and Phelan

On the whole, experience has merely shown that the framers of the Charter misjudged the moral sentiment of this community. They thought that the people would always want a man of exceptional virtues for Mayor, and that they would have no difficulty in finding men immune to the passions that beset ordinary mortals. Their ideal man for Mayor was James D. Phelan, who started the Charter on its way by deftly violating some of its most sacred provisions. He was a reformer, but he soon made it plain that his purpose was to build up a political machine for his own benefit. The Charter appeared to be specially adapted for machine-building. Mr. Phelan sought to divert attention from his political juggling by projects for the improvement of the public morals. While saloonkeepers were being subjected to rigorous restrictions Mr. Phelan was demoralizing the city government. He was puritanical in all matters not affecting his private interests. Phelan's record under the Charter is no better than that of Schmitz. That the people prefer a man of the Schmitz calibre to one of the Phelan stripe is evident from the fact that the latter did not dare to run again after his first term under the Charter, while Schmitz boldly went before the people and secured vindication of his administration. There are many of us who do not approve of the methods of Schmitz. We do not object so much to the freedom which he permits in tenderloin circles, but we deprecate his alliance with a thrifty and crafty politician. We feel that he has created opportunities for graft, and that his methods are a menace to the welfare of this community. We fear that as a consequence of those methods this city is destined to become a prey to a system of brigandage of a most infamous type. But it should be remembered that the people want Schmitz. They have said so, and it is the people's prerogative to dictate the character of government they should have. His re-election is not symptomatic of dissatisfaction with the Charter.

Our Suspicious Promptness

The secession of Panama was just what might have been expected, but from the circumstances attending the organization of the new Republic, the suspicion arises that the authorities at Washington received a very quiet tip as to what was going to happen. Moreover it is not improbable that they encouraged the people by whom the little revolution was conducted. It is not unlikely that the conspirators were advised that as soon as their political machinery was in good working order they would be given recognition. That the secession of Panama was anticipated is evidenced in a measure by the fact that the Pacific Squadron, under Admiral Glass, was ordered down to Central America several weeks ago, though the ships had returned from there not more than three months before. War vessels had also been sent down on the Atlantic side, and when the trouble commenced Uncle Sam was "Johnny on the spot." No doubt President Roosevelt will be severely criticised for what appears to have been connivance at a conspiracy against the peace and dignity of a foreign State, but no doubt he will be able to give satisfactory explanation. European statesmen seem to have no doubt that this Government aided and abetted the revolutionists, and if that is so we shall have some difficulty in vindicating what savors very much of a highly immoral act. However, much may be urged in extenuation. The people of Panama have suffered great injustice at the hands of the politicians of Colombia. They have been badly treated for years, and when the scheming and corrupt Central American politicians sought to subject this country to a hold-up process in connection with the purchase of the canal, and declined to sell except at an exorbitant figure which our State Department would not consider, the people of Panama decided that they would not submit to corrupt rule any longer. They are as anxious for the construction of the canal as we are, and from the standpoint of their own interests they were justified in seeking independence. Unfortunately there has been a great deal of scandal over the purchase of the canal from the French promoters, and it has been openly charged that United States Senators have been bribed to favor the project. Of course the scandal will receive fresh impetus now that a revolution has been successfully pulled off with what many believe was the co-operation of our State Department.

The Cause of the Revolution

The situation in Colombia during the few weeks preceding the revolution was one of perplexing uncertainty. With the adjournment of the Colombian Congress two weeks ago, the possibility of favorable action on the Hay-Herran treaty vanished, although President Marroquin, an honest and progressive man, was said to be anxious to see the Panama canal completed by the United States. The failure of the treaty to pass was due to the fact that the Liberals were reluctant to assist the dominant Conservative party by voting for a measure that would place a large sum—the ten millions offered by the United States—in the hands of an oligarchy striving constantly to keep the Liberals out of power. The nation was impoverished by the three years' war which came to an end a few months ago, and when the Hay-Herran convention expired the Colombians were desperate in their poverty, and each day rumblings of discontent were heard that presaged the secession of the Province of Panama. To say that this Government had inside information which was not possessed even by the Colombian representative at Washington is absurd. The revolution was predicted in Panama weeks ago. There is a very low standard of honor in Colombian politics. The average South American statesman is a grafter on a broad gauge, and many of them perceived the disproportion between the forty millions offered by Uncle Sam to the French Canal Company for work performed and franchises, and the proposed compensation to the Bogota Government for the conveyance of the right to complete and operate the canal. Some of them thought it sagacious to inquire what would happen if the French company were forced into having its concession with the Columbia lapse six years hence. They calculated that they could claim, under forfeiture, everything done on the Isthmus by French capital, and negotiate afresh with the United States with the prospect of getting the full fifty millions. So they were inclined to "squeeze" the canal company, but meanwhile the people of Panama were becoming more and more indignant, and realizing the purpose of the grafters they finally decided to throw off the yoke of a corrupt government.

The Discouragement of Thought

No sooner has the "habit of reading," that much prayed for step towards the millennium, fastened itself upon the populace, when the same voices, or to be more accurate, voices from the same class who urged and argued in its favor, are raised in protest. From all sides we hear the complaint that there is too much reading, that constant reading weakens the power of independent thought, that people read when they should be otherwise employed. Intellectual dram-drinking and mental debauchery are amongst the other terms of reproach and apparently there will soon be a movement on foot to discourage the book-habit. Reading has been put to the same abuses as has every newly discovered cure-all, and having failed to accomplish the impossible, it is meeting the fate of all dethroned idols. Theoretically, if people could only be made to read, the whole population of the earth would speedily become not only enlightened, but learned. To have a book in hand was in itself a virtue, no matter what the book itself chanced to be. But people have been educated in late years to avoid thinking at all times. They have been encouraged to read for diversion and not for instruction. Children have been coaxed through the kindergarten and primary grades by means of stories and games, and the classics have been adapted to the understanding of the advanced pupils. Sociology, finance and every other abstraction is rendered popular by means of dialogue. Religion is a novel. So-called problems which could be solved by applying one of the Ten Commandments are discussed through five hundred pages of fiction and left an open question in the end. Even those comparatively few readers who have a reputation for the profundity and solidity of the books they select will be found to patronize popular science, in which the scientific idea is sacrificed to the popular, so that they are neither the one thing nor the other. Some one has aptly described a vast quantity of this stuff as peptonized reading tablets. But it is not reading that should really bear the blame for all this. People must have occupation of some sort, and modern improvements have made way with many of the old-fashioned time-killers. The experiment of building a royal road to learning has proved a failure. In trying to make education both universal and popular it has been made too easy. The process has been akin to the saying of old-country folk about sugaring the soap in order to get the boys to wash themselves. Every exertion has been spared to pupils, and instead of teaching them to surmount obstacles they have learned only to sit down and wait till some one removed the obstructions for them. Long ago pupils who "quit school" because it was too hard for them were under a ban, but now, let it be hinted at that brains are exerted and immediately there is a toning down of requirements, so that, between the class who read mechanically, because they do not know what else to do, and those who are deluded into the belief that they are accomplishing great things by devoting themselves to abridgements, adaptations and digests, and reading so many hours a day, just as they would practice scales and finger exercises, small wonder that no great good is accomplished by looking at printed pages.

and fruit patches has been tried, and with success. The women are said to accomplish as much work as men, do it better, and withal, uncomplainingly. The employer can go about other duties in security, knowing that the women will not need watching, and that unlike Hiram and Silas, they will plod along, from daylight to dark, without stopping to discuss politics, light their pipes, or kill time. Simultaneously with this report from the strongholds of Puritanism comes a despatch from Chicago, in which it is given out that three Italian women have applied to the street-cleaning department for work. One of them claims to have been a freight handler in Naples, to have removed debris from Pompeii in a wheelbarrow, and to have handled brick. Another had been a street cleaner in her native land and had drawn a milk cart, harnessed side by side with a dog, while the third had been a street cleaner and a quarry hand. The superintendent of one of the street cleaning brigades, a woman, was in favor of putting the women on the force, but the general superintendent declined to do so, reasoning very justly, that the question of prime importance was not the ability of the women to do the work, or their need of work, but the opening of the door to the employment of women in America in such occupations. It is not probable that the women themselves would undergo any special hardship, particularly if the stories of their occupations at home were true. Neither is there anything more fatiguing in the work of keeping a definite stretch of a street in good order than there is in the performance of the endless tasks which fall to the lot of the house-keeper among the poorest classes, but there is a principle involved. It is not for the uplifting of the masses that they should become familiar with the spectacle of women employed in such occupations, and the usual first result is to foster idleness and laziness in the males of their household and race. The peas and berries raised by the peonage of Italian hired women and the streets cleaned by their hands may be all that can be desired in the abstract, but in the end, they will prove to be dear-bought. There are some occupations which it is against the spirit of the American people to encourage women to enter. The effort to introduce the English bar-maid into New York was a dismal failure, and the same cold frost should be generated wherever there is a disposition to employ females as hod-carriers, scavengers, street cleaners, coal miners or beasts of burden.

Mormon Agitation Once More

The Mormon question is once more agitating Utah. A bitter controversy is in progress there, preliminary to a demand for an investigation of the operations of the Mormon Church, to be presented to Congress at its next regular session. When Utah was admitted as a State it was under the condition, implied at least, that the Mormon Church was to take no part in politics. Now it is charged that the church has become all-powerful in politics, and that the high officers of the church are living in polygamy. It is alleged that the church controls all Utah elections, and that it has laid its plans to hold the balance of power in the United States Senate by electing Senators from Utah, Idaho, Montana, Wyoming, Nevada, Colorado, Arizona, New Mexico and Oregon. The proposition, therefore, to admit the territories to statehood is involved in the fight, together with the right of United States Senator-elect Reed Smoot, a Mormon Apostle, to sit in the Senate. In their campaign the Gentiles are making use of testimony taken before Judge Anderson in the United States court in Utah in 1889. The testimony has not been heretofore available. It was given by several people who took the Mormon oath in the Endowment House. It is of a blood-curdling character and provides, among other things, for avenging "the blood of the prophets against the Government of the United States." Each woman is required to swear that she is willing to allow her husband to have more wives than one. It was testified that the Mormon leaders frequently pray for the overthrow of the Government, and that members of the church are sworn to obey the priests of the church in all things temporal and spiritual, politically and socially. As a result of this testimony Judge Anderson held that persons who had taken the endowment oath were not fit to become citizens of this country, and he refused the application of five Mormon foreigners to become citizens. It is now contended that, as one of the quorum of Mormon Apostles, Senator-elect Smoot must place the will of his quorum above the Constitution of the United States or the laws of the land, and that as the mouthpiece of a despotic hierarchy he cannot represent the people of Utah.

It appears from the Central Pacific report of earnings for the year that a million dollar increase of gross has been converted into a three-hundred-and-fifty-thousand-dollar increase in surplus. On the Union Pacific property, the surplus increase will probably be about $650,000. The sum of the two, about $1,000,000, will be just about offset by the decreased net earnings of the Southern Pacific, and thus the system will show for the year an almost unchanged surplus, after tremendous betterment expenditures, such as were outlined specifically in the statement of improvements made upon the Harriman lines. Union Pacific net earnings are now beginning to gain.

The Feminine Naval Contingent

Naval ladies attached to the American squadrons in Asiatic waters may be categoried in two classes: (1) Women of wealth who have married into the navy for the social prestige, and (2) women who have just married into the navy. The subalterns of the navy who are married to women of the first class are deemed fortunate; those who are called upon to support women of the second class are presumably only happy.

The two classes are easily distinguishable. As a rule, the naval woman of wealth is loud and ostentatious; she advertises her origin wherever she goes; she lacks the repose and refinement that birth and good breeding confer. I have been compelled to blush for my countrywomen frequently, in the presence of these parvenus. Only the other evening I was shocked by one of these loud Americans whose coarse provincialism is a jesting sneer in the comment of all who are forced into contact with them.

A lady, not attached to the navy, was pacing the verandah of the Nagasaki hotel, accompanied by her husband. This lady had but recently landed from a tempestuous voyage and was still weak from a prolonged sickness. Feeling somewhat fatigued by the exertion of walking, she took her husband's arm.

"Affectionate couple," commented the young naval cub who was sitting with the Loud American.

" I hate it—it's common," was the response in a foghorn tone that was distinctly audible to the "affectionate couple"—as was intended by the naval person.

This is only a mild example of what the refined, well bred American abroad is compelled to endure when this class of American women is in evidence.

I have called these people Loud. The adjective is well chosen. At table, in the dining-room you may hear them discussing the most trivial matters in the most excited manner. How they were nearly capsized by their 'ricksha coolie; the award they offered a shopkeeper for a brass pot and the amount they finally paid for the trash; the total value of their Chefoo chits; the fact that they had shipped seven trunks loaded to the muzzle on board one of the battleships; speculation as to the "safest" method of "getting through" the custom house with the least cost.

Not many of them, I must confess, are so vainly ignorant that they sign themselves in the hotel registers as "Mrs. Captain Jones," "Mrs. Lieutenant Smith" or "Mrs. Ensign Robinson"; but I have observed instances of this sort of thing, and they have made me express my disgust in a most ungentlemanly manner—I was ashamed of myself thereafter, but the expression was spontaneous and beyond my immediate control.

These naval ladies are shop mad—but this description will apply with equal force to all of the globe-trotting women abroad in the Orient. These women are scarcely landed from their ships in a new town before they are bargaining in some curio trap or haggling in the bazar of a silk merchant whose sole purpose in life is the spoiling of the Egyptian. Here again the distinction is apparent between the naval lady who has money and the lady who is dependent on her husband's modest income. The shop-keeper of the Orient differentiates the rich "in her own right" and the woman who "can't afford the best." The plethoric purse invariably pays more for nothing than the empty wallet of the mere naval woman.

I was amused by an incident that occurred a few days ago in this town involving some of the highest if not quite the mightiest ladies attached to the Asiatic Squadron. A great festival is to be celebrated here tomorrow—the Kunichi-odori of O-Suwa Temple. This festival is for the purpose of commemorating the building of the temple six hundred years ago. The temple was erected as a Shinto protest against the Christian religion, which had just been extirpated by fire and sword from Nippon.

The circumstance, however, that the great demonstration is a perpetuation of Japanese hatred for the interloping Christian does not, in any manner, detract from its uniqueness as a pagan pageant, and there is always a terrific scramble for special invitations among the foreigners who may happen to be in Nagasaki during October of each year. These invitations are issued by the Governor for the event of October seventh, and by the Mayor for the lesser affair of the ninth.

When the naval ladies now in port first heard of this festival they treated the announcement with the scorn that anything Japanese usually excites in these superior women. It was one of those street shows, don't you know, and they could see all that was necessary from the promenade deck of a 'ricksha. It was finally broken to them, as gently as possible, that the Kunichi-odori was not only a "street-show" but an exclusive "society event" under the immediate patronage of Governor and Madame Arahawa. Already Consul Charles B. Harris had given in the names of twenty-five officers of the American warships Kentucky, New Orleans and Albany, then moored in the harbor, and the edict had gone forth that Governor and Madame Arahawa could not accommodate any more, either on the grand stand erected at their residence, or at the champagne tiffin after the "street show."

Then you should have heard the flutter of those naval ladies! A "society function!" Oh, dear me, why didn't somebody tell us about it before? Exclusive, too! Why didn't the horrid newspapers print something in the social column?

Finally clamored the question, "What shall we do to be saved?" and—horror of horrors—it developed that even the Admiral's wife could not attend the "function" if she had not called on Madame Arahawa—Japanese etiquette, you know, very Western—a pretense of acquaintance as a basis for the formality of an invitation.

The naval ladies, high and mighty in their ideas of their own exclusive social condition, had not thought it worth while to call on or even to leave their cards with the Governor's wife, but now they hastened, in their best bibs and most fashionable tuckers, to make social amends. But alas! these peris were too late—the gates of Paradise were closed. The list of invitations was more than full.

Consul Harris was constituted a court of last appeal on behalf of these humble applicants. Consul Harris is a diplomat as well as a commercial representative of his country, and he earned the eternal gratitude of those high and mighty naval ladies, by striking from the invitation list a sufficient number of ward-room officers to make room thereon for the negligent naval ladies.

Now those naval ladies are very happy.

But how about the poor officers of the ward-room?

Perhaps these don't count in the navy when the ladies are concerned.

I have said nothing regarding the naval ladies in the second class simply because they are ladies in every sense of the term—on the principle that good wine needs no bush.

Nagasaki, October 17. THE WANDERER.

The Solitary

BY HARRY COWELL

The body is a house of many windows: there we all sit, showing ourselves and crying on the passers-by to come and love us.—Robert Louis Stevenson.

Experience, already reduced to a swarm of impressions, is ringed round for each one of us by that thick wall of personality through which no real voice has ever pierced on its way to us, or from us to that which we can only conjecture to be without. Every one of those impressions is the impression of the individual in his isolation, each mind keeping as a solitary prisoner its own dream of a world.—Walter Pater.

A mysterious awe, succeeded by a strange sadness, invariably comes over me whenever I realize that I, a social product, loving society, am by nature doomed to solitude. Nor is there much comfort in the reflection that this, my misery, has for company every man born into the world. Without this prison of personality—through the bars of which we carry on our conversations, make love, misunderstand our fellows and are misunderstood by them—you would not be you, nor I, I. With it, we are solitaries serving life sentences. Choose I my words never so wisely, no sooner have they reached your ears than they suffer a sea change. Your "peculiar difference" divides us and must ever divide. One after another I throw open the windows of my house and cry with all my might on you, the preferred passer-by, to come and love me; but no real voice reaches you, most delightful of conjectures. Though I should be so fortunate as to attract your attention, your eyes cannot see me; me you cannot love.

The desire, then, of the noble-hearted to be understood, to hold sweet converse with denizens of their own dream world, can never, this side Death, be wholly satisfied. Howsoever frank he may be; howsoever much he may forego falseness—the white lies of love, the gray lies that lubricate the wheels of society, the black lies that blight existence; how successful soever in showing himself: no man makes his soul self known to any other man, much less to any woman. Life perforce is spent in loneliness and longing. Perfect society—complete love in conjunction with complete understanding—is impossible. One may approach nearer and nearer to it, but the line of progress is asymptotical.

The universal desire for happiness that makes kin of men of all colors, creeds and classes has, as an almost invariable by-product, the desire to be loved. But no man is really loved unless he is conceived of as he really is. If my longing for love leads me to deceive; if by means of speech or silence, or what not, I succeed in making a false conception of me—that is, one which does not correspond to the facts—rise in your mind, and in this way apparently win you for friend or lover, I myself am the victim of my own deception. Not me you love, but an imaginary man merely; a concept with which I do not coincide. Kisses meant for another I may indeed receive; bitter are they, however, bought with a lie, meaningless as other kisses of commerce. I have obtained love under false pretenses. A loveless life, bereft of beauty, should be my portion forever, a prisoner in a prison within a prison. Punishment aside, what does it profit me to have love's wild glances and wonder words pass through me to an object in the air beyond—a lover veritably such stuff as dreams are made of? It is only when I am approximately what my friend thinks I am that I may consider myself beloved. Fine women do not marry men; they marry their own ideals—ideals to which actual husbands, as wives wake up to know them, have little correspondence; as I, a man, know them, less; as God knows them, still less. Fond lover, the woman you adore, as she, or rather her representation, may have told you, has no existence outside of you. You, with the help of your friends, the poets, makers of dream women, have created her. Like other idolaters, 'tis your own work you worship. God has made passable women, to you surpassing. Ah me, and alas! you woo a work of art, a fiction, and wed a work of nature, a fact. The world over, men and women are holding lies to their hearts. The truth they would spurn. Many a new-made benedict—his lips upon the lips of his bride, the law of the association of ideas constraining him to remember loves of yester-year, dear dead leaves of lost springs which the winds have blown all away—has reason to feel grateful to the thick wall of personality; to thank his stars that no real voices of the past can pierce through it to the confiding conjecture that curls inside his bared breast and encircling arms. And forget not the complementary vice versa, O most virtuous reader, of the sex that differs so delightfully from mine!

But O, how well, after all, I know you and how well I love you, most solitary of the myriad prisoners of this planet—penitentiary of which Death keeps the key—you who, scorning to cheat for even life's greatest prize, exhaust every imaginable means of making yourself understood as in very deed you are; and sit by wide-open windows many a weary day and night, and watch him whom the immortals call Pteros fly past you and alight on sill after sill where blinds are drawn and walls willingly impenetrable—you who preserve your own dream of a world that is indeed a dream; where life is fragrant and colorful as a field of flowers; where birds of unearthly plumage sing unheard of songs; where a voice from the depths of the soul answers the voice of the waves, laugh for laugh, sob for sob—you who would fain make your wall transparent and penetrable; who would fain know the sound of a real voice; a voice low and tremulous with love for you, for you as you really are!

On the Little Sandy

Just within the mystic border of Kentucky's blue-grass region
There's a silver strip of river lying idly in the sun,
On its banks are beds of fragrance where the butterflies are legion
And the moonbeams frame its glory when the summer day is done.

There's a little, rose-wreathed cottage nestling close upon its border
Where a tangled mass of blossoms half conceals a tiny door,
There's a sweet, narcotic perfume from a garden's wild disorder,
And the jealous poppies cluster where its kisses thrill the shore.

From across its dimpled bosom comes the half-hushed, careful calling
Of a whippoorwill whose lonely heart is longing for its mate,
And the sun aslant the sleepy eyes of foxgloves gently falling
Tells the fisherman out yonder that the hour is growing late.

From the branches of the poplars a spasmodic, sleepy twitter
Comes, 'twould seem, in careless answer to the pleading of a song,
And perhaps the tiny bosom holds despair that's very bitter
For his notes are heard no longer by the little feathered throng.

Then the twilight settling denser shows a rushlight dimly burning—
Ah, how well I know the landing drowsing 'neath its feeble beams,
And my homesick heart to memories of the yesterday is turning
While I linger here, forgotten, with no solace but my dreams.

The Saunterer

The Significance of It

Some people started a lottery scheme in this city the other day by which they expected to dispose of some real estate at a handsome profit and they were promptly arrested. The incident serves to remind me that several other lottery schemes are thriving in this city, and that they appear to enjoy official protection. No attempt is ever made to enforce the laws against them, but whenever an interloper appears in the field he is promptly taken into custody. It is unreasonable to assume that the lottery companies enjoy immunity and even protection without cost. It is understood in political circles that the "graft" from these lottery schemes aggregates ten thousand dollars a month. To whom is the money paid? Perhaps some day a grand jury drawn by a judge without the assistance of a nimble fingered clerk will have its curiosity aroused, and institute an inquiry into the operations of the lottery syndicate.

A Confidential Relationship

Some months ago, when Mayor Schmitz demanded that gambling in Chinatown be suppressed, he was promptly obeyed. Gambling was suppressed for awhile, but evidently the Chinese made new arrangements for they are doing business at the old stands, and our highly moral Mayor, who has just been re-elected by an overwhelming majority, isn't saying a word. If I were less skeptical I should accept the suggestion that all our police and executive officials are good fellows, and that they are encouraging the Chinese and white lottery dealers just because they are in favor of a wide-open town; but being somewhat familiar with the frailty of human nature, I am reluctant to believe that they are overlooking all the splendid opportunities for graft that are afforded them. I have heard it said that as Mayor Schmitz is now in complete control of the Police Department he will soon remove Chief Wittman. I should like to bet a year's subscription to Town Talk against its equivalent in coin that Mr. Wittman will hold his job as long as Mayor Schmitz is in office.

The Quiescent Press

All the indications are that Mayor Schmitz and Chief Wittman enjoy the most confidential relationship. Indeed, so confidential is it that Mayor Schmitz wouldn't consider for a minute a proposition to rupture it. And meanwhile the regularly established lottery agents will continue to extract a hundred thousand dollars a month out of the pockets of the people of this city without the slightest fear of interference. The daily papers that attacked Mayor Schmitz during the campaign, but that cautiously dealt in glittering generalities, will not call attention to the lottery evil or its apparent inducement to graft, because the lottery companies pay a high price for advertising. They will even stand for bold discrimination, such as was exercised the other day against that real estate lottery. On this subject even the pulpit is silent, for the pulpiteers that inveigh against vice do so only when they are assured of publicity in the public prints, and the newspapers will not publish anything that is said against the lottery evil. They will denounce the Chinese who do not advertise and who do no harm except to Chinese, but all others are guaranteed protection. And yet there are people who are sanguine that some day the public conscience of this city will be awakened, and that then it will be impossible for Abe Ruef to name the Mayor.

Thrifty Ho Yow

Ho Yow, the Chinese Consul, who retired from the diplomatic service to engage in commercial enterprises, was a very thrifty heathen, and during his official career in this city he proved himself a very resourceful financier. The merchants in Chinatown marveled at his ingenuity, though they objected to some of his methods. Since his departure the story has leaked out in Chinatown that he tricked the United States Government, having boldly violated the Exclusion Act. When he came to this country he had in his entourage two maid servants who were admitted as members of his official household. Upon his retirement from the service the women should have returned to China, but they are still in this country, and it is said that they were sold to people in the interior of the State.

Mrs. Ronalds Coming

A chronicler of social items reports that Mrs. Ronalds of London is coming to America soon, and that she will probably visit San Francisco. Mrs. Ronalds has one very intimate friend in this city, in the person of Mrs. M. H. De Young, and if she comes here it will in all probability be as the latter's guest. Mrs. Ronalds is the leader of London's fashionable Bohemian set, and she enjoys the favor of royalty. Comparatively few people who have heard of this famous woman, and who know that she was the pet of Sir Arthur Sullivan who bequeathed to her his royalty rights in many of his musical compositions, is an American. Still fewer know that she has a husband. Mrs. Ronalds was a Miss Carter, and it was when she was living in New York with her husband in the sixties that she first met Albert Edward, who was then traveling in cog as Lord Renfrew. They met at the famous ball at the Academy of Music. Afterward she and her husband separated and she went to live abroad, and she has been a favorite in London fashionable and artistic society ever since. She has one daughter who married a Mr. Ritchie, and two sons, one of whom, Reginald Ronalds, was with the Rough Riders. Her husband, Peter Lorillard Ronalds, lives in Connecticut. They are not divorced. They simply live apart. Mrs. Ronalds has one of the best trained voices in London, and she gives afternoon musicales, invitations to which are highly prized.

Ahead of Her Time

Madame Patti is another celebrity who will no doubt receive a great deal of attention from Mrs. De Young when she comes to town. There is a very strong bond of affection between them, and when Mrs. De Young went East a few weeks ago one of the objects of her trip was to attend the first concert of the peerless Queen of Song. Mrs. De Young was the first woman in this country to break through the conventions as they existed nearly two decades ago, in order to entertain Madame Patti at her home. Well do I remember the sensation created by the De Young reception to Madame Patti, though in those days the De Youngs were not numbered among the elite of this provincial burg. In those days our new-rich aristocrats were quite timorous. Nothing short of the hallmark of the socially elect qualified a person for admittance to the Holy of Holies. In that remote period genius was at a discount. Our mushroom aristocrats of those days, who were the progenitors of our cultured swells of today, were not addicted to the habit of lionizing great artists. The stage was an abomination. Bernhardt was impossible because she neglected to procure a marriage certificate. Madame Patti was shocking because she had captivated Nicolini, the husband of another woman and the father of several children. So Mrs. De Young was really in advance of her generation, for now society dotes on celebrities regardless of their morals. Our most exclusive matrons pay homage to the most unconventional of our theatrical stars, and are glad to be invited to the Bohemian Club to a luncheon in honor of even a second-rate actress, and sit at the same table with the lady and her lover. We are no longer squeamish.

Her Past

Now that Patti is heading this way many stories of her past will no doubt be revived. And none will be read with more interest, perhaps, than that of her domestic affairs, for the great diva has had much marital experience. Her first husband was a Marquis, and I believe she was married to him when she met Nicolini, the great tenor, with whom she fell in love. Nicolini was married, but he was fascinated by the beautiful prima donna, and in time he arranged a settlement with his wife so that he could marry the woman who had won his affections. He became the devoted slave of the diva, and they were a very loving couple. When Nicolini died Patti could not be comforted. For awhile it was reported that she was going to enter a convent, but instead she fell in love with the handsome young Baron Cedarstrom, who was a teacher of physical culture in London, and she married him. She is old enough to be his mother. After reading what the New York critics have had to say about Madame Patti I am very anxious to hear her, for none has expressed his opinion clearly. They all agree that she carries her sixty years lightly, that she is still a great master of the art and rouses great enthusiasm, but concerning the voice itself they equivocate. One critic says, "It has lost the freshness of youth and has taken on a slight acidity but at the same time it is far and away the freshest voice that has been heard from so old a throat in our time." Another says that some of her tones were those of a woman in the fulness of her powers, but some showed signs of wear. According to another she caught her audience under something like the old spell, "but to say it was the voice of the old time Patti would be drawing too long a bow." Another somewhat vague criticism is to the effect that her voice sounds no older than she looks and that she looks just as old as her voice sounds.

Circuitous News Gathering

Sometimes the dailies have a roundabout and expensive way of getting the news. Three weeks ago I related that Lily Lawlor, the singer with a foreign education and a hypnotic personality, had been taken under the golden wing of Mrs. Astor of New York, and that she contemplated opening a vocal studio in the metropolis, where she would instruct the progeny of the plutocrats at ten dollars a lesson. The dailies ignored that bit of news, probably because they felt that as it had appeared in Town Talk it had been given general circulation, and that if they used it everybody would have known that they received inspiration from these columns. They waited until Town Talk reached New York where the piece of news excited considerable interest. The New York papers published it, and then when it was wired to the San Francisco dailies by their Eastern correspondents they had no hesitation in giving it further publicity In connection with the same item it was stated that there had been rumors of an engagement between Miss Lawlor and one of San Francisco's wealthiest bachelors. The gentleman referred to was none other than Dr. Harry Tevis, upon whose attentions to Miss Lawlor I commented several months ago.

Her Marvelous Influence

To be a protege of Mrs. William Astor is a distinction that almost any young woman might be pleased to aspire to. Mrs. Astor is IT in the New York Four Hundred. She is the most influential woman in American society today. Her influence extends even to England where her daughter, who was formerly Mrs. Coleman Drayton, is living with her new husband, and enjoying the favor of royalty. Mrs. Drayton had the misfortune to violate the commandment which visits the penalty of ostracism on those who are found out, but such was the influence of Mrs. Astor that her daughter wasn't even snubbed. Coleman Drayton, by the way, never recovered from the publicity in which he was plunged at the time of his famous divorce suit. He passes a great deal of his life abroad and is very devoted to his children. The distinguished James J. Van Alen is another of the sons-in-law of Mrs. Astor. He is a thorough Englishman in sentiment and it has been said of him that he never reads an American publication.

The Source of Her Pull

J. Roosevelt Roosevelt is another son-in-law of Mrs. Astor. He married the second daughter and lives the greater part of the year in England. M. Orme Wilson, the fourth son-in-law, does not care the least about England or Europe, but is a thorough American. It is through her daughters and her sons-in-law that Mrs. Astor derives much of her social influence, though of course her great wealth is no unimportant factor. The men belong to all the most fashionable clubs in New York, and their wives are prominent in the most exclusive sets. So it is evident that Miss Lily Lawlor has taken a big jump socially. It remains to be seen whether she renders any assistance to her loyal friend, Mrs. Gus Spreckels, who is now in New York.

Her Record for Proposals

Although Kitty Du Val and Oliver Dibble have not formally announced their engagement it is a foregone conclusion, and neither cares to make denial. Faithfulness is surely a characteristic of the Dibbles. Addie married her first love, Nat Messer, and now Oliver will marry the sweetheart of his college days. His devotion dates back even to the remoter period when Kitty Du Val was attending dancing school in short frocks, and causing the heart of many a youth to flutter at a glance of her hazel eye. She was engaged to Lieutenant Charles Stone for two years, but on his return from the Philippines the engagement was broken. The glamour of brass buttons had worn off, though when Lieutenant McKinley was here it again looked as though Kitty Du Val was destined to be an army bride. However, the constancy of young Dibble won the day. As Lieutenant Stone is now happily married the heart of neither of the young people was seriously damaged. I have heard that Miss Kitty has had thirteen proposals, an unlucky number, but think of all the fun they must have afforded her. Mr. Dibble is a rising young lawyer, the son of Henry Dibble. The wedding will take place in the spring.

Hearst's New Enterprise

The Los Angeles Examiner is not a bluff, as some people imagined. The first issue of the paper will make its appearance on December thirteenth. Dent Robert, the Pacific coast representative of the Hearst interests, has secured the lease of a fine new building, and the machinery is now being shipped from the East. Meanwhile the people of Los Angeles are awaiting developments, and the wiseacres are predicting that Hearst will be unable to rout Rubicon Otis of the Times. The impression prevails in Los Angeles that Hearst is acting as the emissary of the labor union leaders and that his purpose is to crush Otis, who has been the bitter foe of all labor organizations. The millionaires, the capitalists and the prosperous merchants of the town are with Otis to a man, because he has cooperated with them in keeping a check on the unions. They dislike the Times editor but they are enthusiastic supporters of his paper. They think it is the finest newspaper on the Pacific coast. But when Hearst enters the field the citrusbelters will sit up and take notice. He has asserted that he will start the Examiner with a circulation of thirty-five thousand and that is only five thousand less than the Times has. He has been guaranteed considerable support and of course with the prestige which he already enjoys he is sure to have the patronage of Eastern advertisers at the very start. It is his intention to organize a staff of some of the most brilliant newspaper men in the country for the Los Angeles Examiner, and the new field will be exploited with all the enterprise for which Hearst is famous and which won success in New York and Chicago. Hearst doesn't ask people to like his papers. He merely wants them read, and they are.

The Apotheosis of Ruef

It is now the policy of Mr. Hearst to effect a coalition between the Democratic and Labor Union parties for his own political interests, and hence the booming of Abe Ruef in the Examiner. It is decidedly raw, but when a man is after such a big prize as the presidential nomination he cannot afford to overlook opportunities. According to the Examiner Mr. Ruef is "not a boss of the type that is customary in San Francisco. He is a man of education, a graduate of the University of California, a successful lawyer in large practice, in short a man of ability and force." Mr. Ruef is also pictured by the Examiner as "a great commander," and as a political philanthropist who is losing ten thousand a year through his connection with politics. I am surprised that Mr. Hearst's paper did not go further, and announce that it had discovered in Mr. Ruef the only honest boss in politics, and proclaim him the great exponent of purity and decency in practical politics. Perhaps Mr. Hearst, with his weather eye on the presidential nomination, contemplates proposing the canonization of Abe Ruef. Evidently he forgets that not long ago Abe Ruef was the political partner of Martin Kelly, the value of whose reputation was appraised at one dollar, once upon a time, when he sued the Examiner for libel.

That Broken Compact

Perhaps the Examiner is right in its assertion that Mr. Ruef is not a boss of the type that is customary in San Francisco. We have had some pretty tough bosses in San Francisco, but I never knew one quite so bold and indecent as Mr. Ruef proved himself when he publicly broke his compact with the Republican leaders with whom he entered into solemn association before the last primary election. When the Republican committee was formed of which Ruef was a member, he was asked by Senator A. P. Williams whether he intended to devote himself to the interests of the Republicans or to Mayor Schmitz. He replied that he was a Republican, that he would be for the Republican party and the Republican nominees, and that he believed Mr. Schmitz had made a fatal mistake when he went East to advocate the election of William R. Hearst to Congress. Thereafter Mr. Ruef participated in the deliberations of that committee, shared the confidences of the Republican leaders, went into the Republican convention, remained until the close, and then went out and managed the campaign of the candidate of the Labor party. Perhaps Mr. Hearst considers such conduct consistent with high moral principles, and that he is justified in presenting such a man to his readers as a character worthy of emulation. Mr. Ruef, he tells us, is a graduate of the University of California. I respectfully suggest that this fact be noted by the good people who are urging, these days, that higher education and religion should go hand in hand, and who are contending that education without religion is a failure, and a menace to the nation.

Hail to the Stork

Here's a piece of interesting news that didn't come over the longest leased wire. To be accurate, it came to me in a private letter from New York, where it has not yet received publicity. It is news of the contemplated visit of his Majesty the Stork to the home of the Willie Hearsts. There can no longer be any doubt that the young Napoleon of journalism is actively seeking the nomination for President. He is anticipating the objections of the race suicide cranks. My correspondent informs me that Mr. Hearst is delighted at the prospect of the stork's visit, and that he hopes it will be a boy.

A Club that Does Things

Whatever one may think of women's clubs there is no denying the fact that the California Club has accomplished much for itself and for San Francisco. The entire Telegraph Hill agitation was started, fostered and finally driven to a successful conclusion by the California Club, and Miss Katherine Hittell was the most active member in the furtherance of what everybody agrees was a most worthy object. She was ably assisted by Dr. Dorothea Moore, always an active and energetic club woman. Dr. Moore has made the Juvenile Court her special charge and lawyers and judges say that it is working splendidly. This year the California Club will devote itself to the proper enforcement of the truant law and an effort will be made to have a salaried officer see that the law is enforced in San Francisco. There are thousands of children of school age south of Market street who do not attend any school. The California Club is a working club—it gets there. It does not pretend to be fashionable. There is only one fashionable club in this city—the Century.

His Good Deeds Rewarded

Ex-Mayor Comstock of Sacramento has just been elected auditor and assessor of that town by the largest plurality received by any one on the ticket. Mr. Comstock's friends are delighted. He made no effort to get the office as his opponent, the former incumbent for fourteen years, was his personal friend. Mr. Comstock's friends did all the work with this triumphant result. Mr. Comstock made one of the best executive officers Sacramento ever had. At that time he was an exceedingly prosperous merchant, but undue generosity and bad judgment in indorsing the notes of others impoverished him and made the present office come as a very comfortable solution of the financial difficulties of late middle age.

Art Looking Up

The new society of United Crafts and Arts has an artistic home within and without. The old Trinity School in Central avenue overlooking the bay is a handsome structure and a fitting home for a society of artists and craftsmen. It was to the generosity of Dr. O. N. Orlow, Ph.D., founder of the Society of Human Endeavor, that this new organization was enabled to begin existence under such favorable auspices. The object of the institution is not only to encourage artists and craftsmen in their work, but to stimulate interest among patrons. Hitherto no one has taken especial interest in promoting sales of strictly Californian works, but this society will do so. The United Crafts and Arts building has been beautifully fitted up. The sketching room looks out across the Presidio, Golden Gate and the bay, and there are Chinese, Japanese, Persian, Indian and Turkish rooms each representing the arts and crafts of those countries. The society had its formal opening on Monday night, when most of the guests wore fancy dress in obedience to Dr. Orlow's desire.

Frank McComas will leave for London in January, to take up his home temporarily in that city. McComas's work and that of Whistler filled nearly all the space of one of the leading British art journals last month, so he will not go abroad unheralded.

The Sketch Club and Association of Allied Arts is holding an exhibition of the photographs of W. E. Dassonville. It opened Thursday and will be continued today, at 1308 California street.

The Going of Joullin

Amedee Joullin is feeling like a millionaire. He raffled off a beautiful picture at the Bohemian Club the other day, and the proceeds amounted to five hundred dollars. Joullin thinks that art is languishing in San Francisco because those of our newly rich who aren't too mean to encourage it think that the only pictures worth buying are in Europe, where they purchase potboilers and imagine they are getting old masters. So Amedee is going to shake the dust of San Francisco from his number tens and go to Paris, join some of his old friends of his art student days, open a studio in the artist's quarter, and supply the American trade with pictures made in France. He has given up his beautiful studio in Sansome street which he fitted up less than a year ago, and he will start in two weeks for the Old World.

An Episode of the Jinks

Joullin, by the way, paints almost as well on flesh as on canvas, a fact that was revealed shortly after the late Bohemian Club Bret Harte jinks. He figured in the jinks as one of the gamblers seated at one of the little tables, and he certainly looked the part without the aid of much make-up. According to the program he was to have been caught cheating and be knocked out by Charlie Dickman, the proprietor of the place. They had several rehearsals, and Joullin always dodged the blow so that while he did not receive it the knock-out seemed realistic. But on the night of the jinks he dodged the wrong way and received the blow full in one of his protuberant eyes. Blood flowed, and Joullin yelled for a doctor. He thought he was going to lose his eye, but the injury was not serious. However he touched up the eye in flesh colors, and did a good job.

An Episode of Estee's Career

Judge Estee's funeral was attended by a delegation of members of the Young Men's Institute, a circumstance that recalled an incident of the campaign in which he was a candidate for Governor, the second time. Scarcely had the campaign opened when Estee was waited upon by several of the leaders of the A. P. A. movement. They called his attention to the fact that a Miss Ryan who was employed as a typist in his office, and who has long since been admitted to the bar, was a Catholic, and they said that unless she were discharged their organization would be a [redacted] him. He promptly suggested that they should go to [redacted] ce warmer than Phoenix. The A. P. A.'s were agains[redacted] ee in that campaign and he was defeated by a narrow margin. Miss Ryan subsequently accompanied her employer to Honolulu and she was among the mourners at the funeral.

A Smash at the Court

In mentioning the appointment, by Attorney-General Knox, of Francis J. Heney as special counsel to prosecute the timber-land fraud cases in Oregon, the dailies did not tell the whole story. Before accepting the appointment Mr. Heney wired to Washington that he would not take charge of the cases unless he were empowered to employ Attorney Frost as his assistant. Thereupon Attorney-General Knox wired his consent to the appointment of Frost. The occurrence has occasioned a deal of gossip in legal circles for Mr. Frost is one of the men who were indicted for various offenses growing out of the Nome mining litigation, in which District Judge Noyes was involved. Frost was convicted in the Federal court of this district, and sentenced to a term of imprisonment. Heney was his attorney, and he made a most stubborn fight for his client. After the latter's conviction Heney applied to Washington for a pardon and in his petition he stated that he had nothing to offer in mitigation of judgment, but he demanded the pardon on the ground that Frost was the victim of malicious persecution and that he had been unjustly convicted. The pardon was granted, and it was generally construed to be a reflection on the court as well as on the attorneys who conducted the prosecution. And now the man whose vindication was achieved in so signal a manner is acting as a representative of the law department of the Federal Government.

He Wouldn't Be Bluffed

The rise of Heney in the legal profession, by the way, is being observed with a great deal of interest. Though a native of this city he is comparatively a new member of the bar, for shortly after his admission he went to Arizona, where he practiced several years, and established a reputation not only for his brilliancy, but also for his courage and his devotion to the interests of his clients. Not even the worst of the bad men ever succeeded in frightening the natty and polished young practitioner from San Francisco. One day his office was entered by a young woman, the wife of the most prominent surgeon in the territory, a man noted for his dexterity in handling a gun. She had been brutally treated by him, and wanted a divorce, but her husband had announced that he would kill any man that took her case, and every lawyer to whom she had applied begged to be excused. When she submitted her case to Heney he expressed regret, saying that he did not like to invite trouble, but at the same time he felt that if he could be dissuaded from performing his duty as an attorney, then he should quit practicing law. He took the case, prosecuted it strenuously despite the threats of the bully, secured a decree, and also a large sum of money for his client. Thereafter the surgeon sought to make Heney's life miserable and resorted to various devices to provoke a quarrel. Heney evaded him repeatedly until one day, when he found himself in jeopardy and he promptly ended the career of the bully. After that the people wanted to elevate him to high office but he preferred to come to this city.

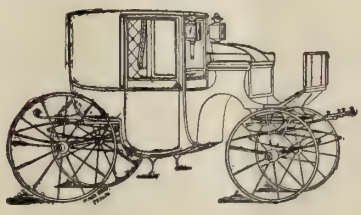
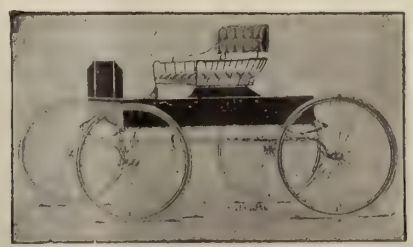
An Emergency Call



The same spirit that won him distinction in Arizona has occasionally asserted itself in the course of his practice in San Francisco. The prosecution of his clients in the Nome case was most bitter, but he defended them with skill and courage, and made some of the opposing attorneys ashamed of themselves before it was over. Not long ago he covered himself with glory by helping Sheldon Kellogg out in the Spring Valley Water Rate case. Kellogg was ill and he asked Heney to take the case. Though he had only a few days in which to prepare himself, he worked day and night and succeeded not only in getting ready but also in securing a judgment.

The Welch-DeLaveaga Wedding

Never before was a local church so elaborately and beautifully decorated as was St. Mary's Cathedral, last Wednesday, on the occasion of the marriage of Miss Julia De Laveaga and Andrew P. Welch. The floral decorations were the most sumptuous and artistic that were ever seen in the Catholic cathedral. The wedding procession passed under a hanging canopy of streaming smilax, and along an avenue hedged with chrysanthemums. The spacious edifice presented a most picturesque appearance. The nuptials were attended by nearly one thousand people and the marriage ceremony, accompanied as it was by a full orchestra and a large chorus, and performed on the steps of a brilliantly lighted altar from which rose graceful palms, and on which were assembled two archbishops and half a dozen priests, was indeed an impressive one. There were the usual functionaries in attendance on the bridal couple, and constituting a most brilliant entourage. The most beautifully gowned of them all was Mrs. Eugene Lent, sister of the groom, who looked stunning in pink chiffon. The wedding was a union of two ardent lovers and of the offspring of very wealthy people, and the wedding presents represented a small fortune. The groom's gift to his bride was a superb necklace of pearls. The mother of the groom presented a large silver bowl and service. Mr. Miguel de Laveaga, father of the bride, presented a chest of silver. Charley Welch's gift was a set of rare glassware, and Louis Welch presented a silver tea set, while Mrs. Lent contributed several massive pieces of silver. Beside the gifts of relatives there were numerous tokens from friends, and among these the one that will probably be prized the most came from Father Kenna and the faculty of Santa Clara College, a beautiful piece of polished wood from the cross erected by the Franciscan fathers at Santa Clara when they established a mission there in 1777. On one side is the picture of the college burnt into the wood and on the other is a copy of a painting of the original mission.



His Third Time

It is hoped that the old adage, "Three times a bridesmaid never a bride" cannot be distorted for application to the sterner sex. If it could, more than one match-making mamma might have cause for regret, for when William F. Humphrey officiated as best man at the Welch-De Laveaga wedding it was his third appearance in that role. He was best man for his partner, Eugene Lent, and again for his friend J. J. Barrett, the attorney. Mr. Humphrey is one of the eligible young bachelors who is regarded as a most desirable catch. He has made rapid strides in the legal profession, and today the firm of Lent & Humphrey numbers among its clients some of the wealthiest people in San Francisco. He is one of the most brilliant of the younger graduates of Santa Clara College, and is a prominent member of the University and Olympic clubs. He is possessed of graces of person as well as of mind that have made him the object of considerable angling.

Feared Fortune Might Restrain Swains

Miss Florence Mason is going to spend the winter in Paris with her cousin Nell Grant. Miss Mason has lived across the bay, in Alameda, all her life, and though she has had the advantage of university training she has not traveled very extensively. She is a girl of considerable originality which was not trained out of her at Berkeley, as has happened with other clever girls. She was the first to introduce the poster style of picturesque gowning at the U. C. some four years or so ago, in her senior year. As she is slim to angularity the clinging garments gave her a Burne-Jones air and were soon copied by others and displayed on the campus. Miss Mason has an independent fortune but when she inherited the legacy from a relative's estate she did not seem especially happy.

"I don't see why I should be glad," she said, "for fancy if some poor boy falls in love with me. He won't tell his love for fear of being called a fortune hunter, and so think of the proposals I'll miss."

She'll Marry Abroad

I hear that Miss Mason intends buying her trousseau in Paris, but that she has not yet decided whether to marry in England or India. For a long time it was rumored that she was engaged to one of the prominent officers at the Presidio, and every one expected that her wedding would be one of the smart military weddings of the year. Mr. Mason, I hear, was disappointed that by reason of his daughter's choice of a husband she will have to leave San Francisco. He built a beautiful residence for her as an inducement to stay here.

A Veteran Editor

Mr. and Mrs. John P. Young are to leave in January for a four months' trip to Europe. They will go by the Mediterranean route and take in Greece, Alexandria and Egypt. They will return by way of Naples and arrive here during the summer. Mr. Young is the very energetic managing editor of the Chronicle, and there are few newspaper men who are more entitled than he to a vacation. He has held the position of managing editor of the Chronicle for about a quarter of a century, and I doubt whether there is another man in the country who has been employed in the same capacity on a daily for such a long period.

Busy Mrs. Martin

Mrs. Eleanor Martin's latest fad is newsgathering. She has been a success at many things and now she is trying her hand as a reporter of social news, but she is doing so in the interest of her protegee Mrs. Ynez Shorb White, the widow of an army officer, and daughter of the late De Barth Shorb, once a multi-millionaire of Los Angeles. Mrs. White is the very successful social editor of the Post, and Mrs. Martin hustles news of the smart set in her interest. It is a strong combination. It's by way of reciprocity, I presume, that Mrs. White writes of Mrs. Martin as the Mrs. Astor of the Pacific coast, but that is no exaggeration for the mother of Walter and Peter has tremendous influence among our provincial aristocracy. But she is no Ninon d'Enclos, as Mrs. White would have us believe.

The Exclusive Gaiety Girls

There has never been such an absolutely hedged-in cotillion club in local society as that which was formed at Mrs. Eyre's home the other day. Generally the dancing clubs have admitted a few "outsiders," but this one will not. There are just thirty girls who form the club, among them the King sisters, Miss Eells, Miss Pomeroy, Miss Coleman, Miss Wilson, Miss Cheseborough, Miss Allen and Miss McCalla. The cotillions will be given at the members' homes when the ball-rooms permit, and when they are not sufficiently large the hostess will hire a hall. The thirty youths who will be invited to attend each cotillion will be chosen by secret ballot. The club is not formed entirely of buds, but all the girls are young. It may be hard for them to find thirty different dancing men to be balloted for at each cotillion, but of course the most popular men will be invited more than once. They have dubbed the new organization the Gaiety Club but they intend to call a meeting soon to change the name, as some of the fresh jeunesse doree began to allude to the members as the Gaiety girls.

Czar and Czarina

The debutantes say that though they enjoy Czar Greenway's dances they have little show there, pitted as they are against their older sisters. The girls who have been out several seasons, and the young matrons, are always the belles at the Greenway Friday Nights. Mrs. Salisbury is expected to be back in time to preside over the Fortnightlies, but she has not promised to return. By the way, one of the good things about "Aunt Sal," as some of her young dancing men call her, is that she always likes to see a girl enjoying herself. If a pretty but poor girl is surrounded by a circle of admirers her stock goes up at once with Mrs. Salisbury. She objects to girls who cannot save themselves from being wallflowers. It is a sort of reflection on her choice of feminine guests, and she resents it.

Should Learn Small Talk

It is one of the odd things about the smart dancing clubs that it is not the heiresses who get the most dances. Some of the girls with the fattest dots are the most shunned, and the supposedly fortune-hunting youth gives as the reason, "They can't talk." This shows why the teacher of chit-chat flourishes in New York, and why the clever dotless one has matrimonial offers above her duller moneyed sister. Two of the richest heiresses in San Francisco cannot boast of a single offer, so say their bosom enemies. And the reason is that though they are not lacking in looks, and their gowns are planned by a modish modiste, they are not able to make a bluff at conversation. Even a brainless youth likes a rattle of small talk between dances. If the girl can't talk, he leaves her with mamma and seeks the supper-room instead of the conservatory or cosy corner.

The Season Early this Year

The season is very early this year and a crowd of brilliant entertainments will make the end of November very gay. Two large teas for November twenty-first and two large ones for the twenty-eighth will fill both those Saturdays to overflowing. On the twenty-first Miss Helen Chesebrough and Miss Virginia Newell Drown will make their initial bow at Mr. and Mrs. Chesebrough's "at home" between four and seven. On the same day at the same hour Mrs. Tallant will introduce her young daughter, and Mr. and Mrs. Maurice Casey and Miss Katherine Dillon will give an "at home" in honor of Mrs. Henry. On the twenty-eighth the handsome Livermore home on the top of Russian Hill, which has been entirely remodeled and much enlarged, will be thrown open both for a housewarming and for the debut of the daughter of the house, the charming Miss Livermore, who has her mother's vivacity and good looks and will have all of Miss Gertrude Eells's popularity. Almost every Saturday in November has its promise of teas to come, and the next two months will be as gay as any San Francisco has ever known.

A California Girl's Success

Word comes to me from New York that Charlotte Thompson is making considerable progress there. While she has made no brilliant success, her work counts as matter well done. She rehashes small plays and makes more money at this than she ever did at school teaching. She and Margaret Anglin are still great friends, reports to the contrary notwithstanding, and they pass a part of each year together.

An Author Will Wed

Our bachelor girls are evidently determined not to be the "menace to the nation" that the Eastern reverend termed them, judging by the way in which they are changing their condition. Announcements of engagements of bachelor girls no longer cause more than a ripple of surprise. Therefore when the news arrived this week from the East that Juliet Wilbor Tompkins had decided to resign her independence in favor of the matrimonial yoke, her friends merely said: "Well, well, who 'll be the next?" Miss Tompkins was one of the first California society girls to take to the pen, and she did not have the hard struggle to succeed that has afflicted most ambitious writers. She was helped along a good deal, and she did not have to wait long for fame and financial recognition. She is a brainy young woman and has added much to the reputation of California's literary cult. The Tompkins family is one of the oldest in this part of the world. At one time the Tompkins ranch in San Leandro was the richest stock farm in this section. The other branch of the family lives at San Anselmo. It is an editor, by the way, Emory Bensley Bopple of the Criterion, to whom Miss Tompkins is engaged. The Criterion was started in St. Louis as a literary weekly, but moved to New York after attaining recognition in the Middle West.

Her Gift for Mots

Quite a romance, by the way, is attached to the Tompkins-Bopple engagement. The twain were engaged before, but it was broken, and this is but a renewal of the old affair. The marriage will be pulled off on the twenty-first. Juliet is the youngest and most attractive of the Tompkins girls, though her sister, Bonnie, though not specially clever, was pretty and well deserved her nickname. She married some years ago. Elizabeth and Juliet both went to Vassar and Juliet was as flippant as it seemed possible for a girl to be. This flippancy she carried into her stories and it is that which makes her work so frothily fascinating. On one occasion she remarked that the only way you could distinguish a Freshman from a Sophomore at Vassar was by the length of their trains. Probably the most famous mot in any of her storiettes is the one about the girl who wished to live a single day of her life as though it were her last, and so went home and cleaned all the insides of her collars.

Hubert Henry Davies, whose "Cynthia" is so well spoken of and who is now termed a "new star" among playwrights, frequented the English colony when he lived in San Francisco. He was often seen at the Sunday afternoon "at homes" of Mrs. Carmichael-Carr, the pianist who later went to London to live. Mr. Davies and Juliet Wilbor Tompkins were great friends and used to exchange witticisms that were afterwards quoted by their friends.

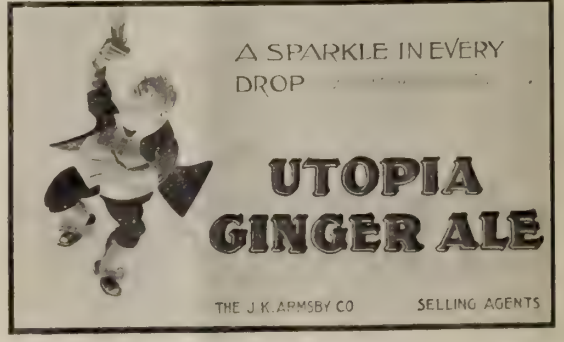
Kicking Outside the Game

Ezra Decoto, who has been general business manager of the University of California sports for several years, will very likely lose his position at the forthcoming election. There has been a great deal of dissatisfaction among the student body over the way he managed the sale of admission tickets to this Saturday's big football game. Early in the first rush to capture the choice seats he posted a notice that the tickets would be issued at nine o'clock on a certain morning. Nine o'clock found a long line of joshing students eager to get their tickets and skip to their recitations, but no one appeared with the tickets. Another notice set the distribution at eleven o'clock; again no one appeared. The same scene happened at three o'clock and again at four o'clock. By this time the disappointment and dissatisfaction had grown to grumbling and rampant kicking. Large numbers of those who had faithfully attended the notices only to be disappointed failed to appear when the tickets were finally distributed. An effort was made to give them an equal chance to good seats by shaking up their coupons in a hat with the checks of the others; but the scheme worked in every way but a satisfactory one, and now a lot of the kickers are declaring that if Manager Decoto couldn't devise a better plan to distribute the tickets some better manager ought to be elected to the position. Decoto probably won't miss the salary much—one hundred dollars a month. But of course the duties are active only a part of the year. He is a graduate of the university and practices law in Oakland when not promoting the welfare of football teams, glee clubs, boat races, and other lines of university student money-getting. The man most talked about to succeed him is Bon Woolsey, who has been assistant business manager for the past two years.

"It Is to Laugh"

The Skull and Keys Fraternity had the greatest "annual run" in their history at the University of California last Friday. Even Professor Sanford of the English Department and Professor Landfield of the History Department, who are honorary members, cut their recitations to help the boys boost the fun along in the initiation of twenty-six neophytes. Dress coats and white duck trousers were en regle—except for the candidates; they thought themselves lucky to be allowed to appear in any old thing. Great and fantastic were the garbs in which they showed up before the large gathering of students on the campus to see them put through their stunts and become full-fledged members of the Skull and Keys. Grantland Voorhies appeared as a clown and did a number of funny gags that kept the delighted audience in high glee; James Force was attired as "Sunny Jim" and tried his best to boost the cereal, notwithstanding the shower of joshings poured on him; Oliver S. Orrick Jr. and Harry Young were disguised as the "Gold Dust Twins"; Rudolph Schilling was incased in a gigantic can, labeled "Spice," and proclaimed its merits; Emile Abadie, who has the reputation of being one of the handsome college men, was linked with Frank Clark and Jack Edwards as "three lovely girls (?)" They looked the parts, as far as the guying would permit them; Monte Cooley was attired as a Chinese and rolled off his stunt in the Celestial lingo, and so on through the whole twenty-six neophytes. Each one had to go through some antics in keeping with his fantastic garb. The program furnished several hours of rare and novel sport in college life on the campus.



The co-eds were so captivated with the entertainment that the most enthusiastic are now actively canvassing the proposition to get up a rival to the Skull and Keys, for girls exclusively. They propose to give their initial entertainment in the early spring in a play full of college gags and topical songs. The members of Skull and Keys are grinning over the promise.

When a Bloomer Meets a Bloomer

The co-eds of the University of California are making royal efforts to get up an extraordinarily good program for the Gym Jinks they are going to give in Hearst hall on the twenty-third instant. As usual nothing that looks like a man will be tolerated within the building while the exercises are being held—that is, excepting Professor Magee, who is in charge of the Gym course, and the girls say he doesn't count. Why he doesn't count the girls of course won't say; naturally the explanation is up to Professor Magee. Occasionally the merry girls call on him to do a little stunt. Last year he sang a song. In these Gym Jink affairs the girls are requested to appear in any old kind of costume they fancy—and bloomers. Bloomers are imperative; they are the distinctive dress of those who exercise in the gymnasium, a common garment in which all kick, dance and exercise to their hearts' content. Sometimes the girls appear in a dress suit and bloomers, sometimes in a jumper and bloomers, sometimes in "mamma's best silk waist" and bloomers, sometimes in a silk hat, smoking jacket, gum boots and bloomers, but no matter what kind of gear they wear above or below, there are always bloomers somewhere in between. This year another rule goes into vogue: henceforth there are to be no chaps, chappies or chapters. Translated from the argot of the full-fledged co-ed, I take it that the edict means there are to be no chaperons, no gentlemen escorts to and from the entertainment, and consequently no entertaining chapters to be told of what happened—in short, each girl is to go it alone, to and from the exercises, unless one pair of bloomers meets another pair of bloomers going gymward. They say the committee in charge of the program is getting up some spirited skits and some topical songs that will make a red-letter record for this year's jinks.

The Parrott Ball

It seems just a little while ago that Mrs. Abby Parrott was lying at the point of death at her San Mateo home, and nobody thought she could possibly recover from her illness. But she did, and presided over the ball at her town house on Wednesday night, looking so well that no one would have fancied she had ever known a day's sickness in her life. The downpour cast no damper upon the ball, which went off with considerable gaiety. When the rain came on Mrs. Parrott had an archway built for her guests to pass under on their way from carriage to door. There was nothing elaborate about the function that introduced the Parrott granddaughters to society. The hospitality dispensed was generous and the welcome extended the guests was genuine, but there was nothing pretentious about the decorations or the supper menu. Mrs. Parrott, like the late Mrs. Susan Tevis, believes in giving parties to which people come to enjoy themselves.

Fred Greenwood keeps putting off the date of his Oriental trip, and the tabbies say that he has a reason for it. They hint that he is going to try his luck again with a certain hard-hearted heiress who lately returned from abroad. That the heiress is believed to be engaged to a naval officer cuts no figure in the tabbies' surmises.

The Sport of Kings

There will be quite a large sprinkling of society at the Oakland track this afternoon, when the winter season will be formally opened. The recent trip of Mr. T. H. Williams to the East was an advantageous one, judging from the number of prominent stables that are to be represented on the turf here this winter. The entries for the various stake events exceed those of last season by seven hundred. Some crack jockeys are already here and more are coming.

A Gotham Custom Transplanted

There is always a great crush at the afternoon teas in the Waldorf-Astoria in New York. It is there everybody meets everybody one knows. The afternoon tea is a popular social function, and now the same attraction has been introduced at the Palace, where it appears to fill a long-felt want. Tea is served from four to six in the beautiful court cafe, and another innovation is the music supplied by the orchestra for after-theatre parties between eleven and twelve-thirty.

The Irate Mrs. Tully

Mrs. Eleanor Gates Tully, who three years ago was a struggling writer for the San Francisco press, has been thinking very well of herself since the Century accepted her "Autobiography of a Prairie Girl." The Tullys spent the summer in California, and enjoyed being lionized by the local literati. When their vacation was drawing to a close Mrs. Tully resolved to pick up a little easy money, and defray the expenses of the return trip by writing a story for the Sunset It was a short and commonplace story for which she was paid twenty dollars. When she received her compensation she was furious, and she wrote editor Aitken a very tart letter to the effect that she expected at least two hundred dollars for her brief effort. She stated that Scribner's had just paid her two hundred and fifty dollars for a story, and then she vented her anger in some unkind comments on the local magazine. Mr. Aitken wrote her a dignified letter saying that his magazine did not pay for name but for merit.

"I should think his flirtations would humiliate his wife."

"On the contrary, they serve as a soothing pretext for her own."

The Sister of Hermann

Hermann Oelrichs's sister, Mrs. Richard Henderson, was a guest at the Goelet-Roxburghe wedding. She came over from England especially to attend the affair, and had not paid her own country a visit for three years previous to this one. At that time she also came over to be present at a wedding—that of Pierpont Morgan's daughter with Herbert Satterlee. Very few here knew that Hermann Oelrichs had a sister married to an Englishman. The Hendersons live in Cheshire, and Mrs. Henderson is an enthusiastic sportswoman. She was one of the first to start cross country riding on this side of the Atlantic, and during her present visit she has purchased a fine string of horses. She is not a bit "horsey" in appearance, however, I am told, but is refined and womanly in every way. She goes in for serious study and is especially interested in modern philosophy. She is the guest of her sister, Mrs. William Jay, at Katonah, during her visit.

She Is Only a Child

Jennie Crocker will be one of the youngest debutantes that ever had a Washington winter. It is doubtful if her sister Mary, who is a bit conventional and somewhat prudish, will permit Jennie to whirl very giddily. For Jennie Crocker is not eighteen yet. She has been educated in the country, and loves outdoor life. She is less imperious than her queenly sister, but loves her own way nevertheless.

To Make the Hair to Grow

Who knows but that the heroine of the great American novel will be she who saved not the life, but the hair of the hero? The bald bachelors in town have all gone in for having their heads massaged, for they swear they will not wear toupees. Reddick Duperu and Worthington Ames are among those who are being treated for premature baldness, and if the experiment succeeds on them there are others who will follow their lead. President Benjamin Ide Wheeler of Berkeley and President David Starr Jordan of Stanford University started in a course of treatment some time ago, for neither cares to look like Cæsar. It is just as easy to be wise with a foot-ball player's head-covering as with a head like a billiard ball.

Picturesque Landsmen Afloat

The return from the north, last week, of the United States Coast and Geodetic Survey steamer Gedney reminded me of some amusing things in connection with the predicament that the Coast Survey encountered a few years ago, when the naval officers were withdrawn from its ships. It undertook to officer its own ships and the results were grotesque. Officers were placed in command whose life work had been "hiking" over tundra and up mountain sides, packing theodolites and other surveying instruments. They were landsmen of the deepest dye. Yet they were made "captains," although the navigation work was done by young seafaring men hired from the outside. Most comical of all, the self-styled "captains" were given gorgeous uniforms, shoulder straps and all—I think swords were proposed at one time, but somebody balked. At one time one of these gaily panoplied officers was mistaken by a sentry at an Army post for some sort of a military officer, and was given a military salute. The Coast Survey officer answered the salute by a good-natured wave of the hand, a "how de-do," and a start to shake hands, when the soldier sized up the situation and recovered his martial reserve. Many of the "captains" have not yet mastered the nautical nomenclature.

Fine Art in Table Setting

Every one who keeps house knows the value of a well set table, and every progressive hostess is on the lookout for new ideas. Realizing that a display that contains suggestions would be appreciated, Nathan-Dohrmann Co., on Sutter street, have arranged an exhibit which shows tables, completely set for luncheon, dinner and midnight suppers; every detail is carried out according to the latest ideas and the finest of English and French China, together with Rock Crystal, Silverware, Flowers and Electric features are shown. The dinner tables show complete course sets for soup, fish, game, roast and dessert. The opportunity to note entirely new features and effects used in this display will amply repay one for the time spent in this interesting establishment. All are welcome to inspect the exhibit.

The Magnanimity of Bradford

"Stick close to your desk and never go to sea, and you will be the ruler of the Queen's navee" has been an adage that has been profitably followed by at least two high officers of the United States Navy, namely, Rear-Admirals Francis M. Ramsay and Royal Bird Bradford, the latter of whom is now about to break his shore-staying record. Ramsay, now retired, was the champion shore-sailor. Out of his whole naval career he spent only about sixteen years at sea—less than many young lieutenants and less than any of his grade at any time. Bradford has run him a close second. For years he has been chief of the Bureau of Equipment, with the Rear-Admiral's rank given in compliment, although he is really only a captain, standing eleventh on the list. He has had only fifteen years nine months of sea duty, out of forty-two years of service. He has had no sea duty whatsoever while a captain and only three years and two months of it while a commander. His last cruise was as a commanding officer of the Monterey, from July, 1896 until July, 1897. When it comes to Sir Joseph Porter, K. C. B.'s, the United States Navy can certainly hold its own. Ramsay and Bradford are elegant specimens. Yet the announcement that Bradford is about to go to sea again for a short time is heralded by his clique as something magnanimous.

Quick Action at Annapolis

In no way is the expansion of the United States Navy more eloquently illustrated than in the present Naval Academy, where the students are now officially termed the "brigade of midshipmen." From the time the academy was founded, in 1842, the students were always referred to either as the "battalion of midshipmen" or the "battalion of cadets." As the term regiment is not used in the Navy, where infantry organizations are either battalions or brigades, the latter term had to be adopted to designate the enlarged corps of midshipmen, who now number over six hundred, more than the academy has ever had in its history. I am told, though, that in its wild desire to obtain the much-needed line officers for the service, the Navy Department has tolerated a regrettable lowering of the standards at the Naval Academy. The midshipmen are rushed through the course in a manner that would strike the old graduate as appalling. The aim is to graduate men, not to "bilge" them, as of yore, when the process was a weeding out one. Now it is get them through. I am told that men are now graduated that would have been "bilged" at their "plebe semi-ann." This is a sad state of affairs, particularly when it is recollected that it is only a score of years ago when one Robeson prevailed upon a poorly informed Congress to pass a bill reducing the number of officers in the Navy, and relegating into civil life a large number of men who had graduated from Annapolis when the standards of scholarship and discipline were much higher than they are today.

The Youngest Rear-Admiral

Washington Lee Capps, the new chief constructor of the Navy, is not yet forty years of age, and is therefore by far the youngest Rear-Admiral the United States Navy has ever had. He was born in Virginia on January thirty-first, 1864, and graduated from Annapolis in June, 1884, being one of the "star" members of his class. I cannot see how President Roosevelt could have made a better selection for Chief Constructor out of the material available in the Construction Corps, in which there are some officers possessing high theoretical ability, others ably practical, and others with wide experience, but none combining the three qualities to the extent that Capps does. The Construction Corps of the Navy of the present day is indeed the corps de genie of the service, as the Engineer Corps is that of the Army. Every member of it is now a graduate of the Naval Academy, picked from the highest men of his class, and then given a post-graduate course in one of the best technical schools of the world. While in former years these young men selected for the Construction Corps were sent abroad for their post-graduate course, either to the Royal Naval College at Greenwich, or the Ecole Polytechnique at Paris, or the Glasgow University, they are now all given the higher course at home, being sent either to the school of naval architecture at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology or to that recently established at Annapolis. The new regime was commenced in 1881, since when none but Annapolis men of the highest standing have been placed in the corps. Before that, the naval constructors were all elderly men who had risen from ship-carpenters, well versed in wooden shipbuilding, but lacking the mathematical and theoretical education required for modern shipbuilding in iron and steel. With rare exceptions, such as that of Philip Hichborn, these old constructors made little progress in latter-day naval architecture.

Quick Action at Stag's Leap

Commander Niblack, whose engagement with Mary Harrington has excited much interest in society, won his fiancee in a rather romantic way. He met her eight years ago in Washington, where she spent some months visiting relatives. They met at dinners and teas but in a most formal way. Several months ago he was ordered to this coast, and among the people who entertained him was Mrs. Horace Blanchard Chase. She is famous for her delightful house-parties at Stag's Leap, and she invited the naval officer to one of them. When her guests arrived she found that two girls had been unable to make the trip. All the others were married and Mrs. Chase was in despair. In thinking of available girls among her acquaintances, she picked out Mary Harrington as the most desirable. She remembered that Miss Harrington had met Commander Niblack in Washington, and so she called her up on the 'phone. "You must come. I have no girls and Nibsie is here," was her message. Miss Harrington demurred. She had other engagements and "Nibsie" didn't particularly interest her. However, after a little pressing she consented. She arrived Friday, and Sunday night her engagement was announced to Mrs. Chase's guests. The Commander is a man of action. He is regarded as one of the best catches in the navy on account of his fine social position. By the way, Louise Harrington is also engaged to a naval man. It was at a hop at Mare Island that young Leahy first met her. He sought an introduction and in three weeks they were engaged.

W. L. Elkins, who died last week, was the father-in-law of Kate Felton, daughter of ex Senator Charles Felton of California. After Kate Felton married W. L. Elkins Jr. she went to the Quaker City to live, though she always said she would return some day and make California her home again.

The McCalla Girls

Mary Kip will have Lillie McCalla as her maid-of-honor. The McCalla sisters are the prettiest and most modish of the Navy girls. They inherit their looks for their mother is one of a family of Boston beauties. They have lived much abroad and foreign associations have added chic to their natural charm of manner. The McCalla home at Mare Island is a most artistic habitat, being furnished with taste and originality. Each room has some special signification. One is filled with Hawaiian curios, another with Philippine souvenirs, another with those of China and still another is in Japanese style. Mrs. McCalla entertains a good deal and is also much interested in work for the sailors. She has raised thousands of dollars for the Sailors' Home.

Mrs. Charles A. Ackerman has returned from New York and is again at her Van Ness avenue home. The Ackerman residence is one of the most artistic in San Francisco. One of its features is a miniature theatre.

Because They Gossiped

An interesting little tempest has been brewing in the family teapot of the Pacific Coast Women's Press Association. Two members have been accused of gossiping too much and they are to be dropped from the membership roll. I believe that this is the first time that an organization of women has ever challenged the right of the sex to gossip. I hear that the two culprits have been exceedingly busy in circulating yarns calculated to promote dissension, and their expulsion was deemed absolutely necessary for the peace and harmony of the organization. However, they may be permitted to resign.

Mrs. "Worthy" Ames returned to town only a little while ago, and her baby, born this week, narrowly missed the privilege of being a San Francisco girl. Mrs. Ames spent most of the summer at the home of her father, Colonel Preston, near Redwood City.

The Rosenbaums' Graceful Act

Mr. and Mrs. Karl Triest of Stockton are spending the honeymoon in Paris. Mrs. Triest was Miss Rosenbaum and her marriage was a recent event in Stockton's smart Jewish set. A graceful act of the bride's parents on the marriage day was the gift of a hundred dollars to the Children's Home. The Rosenbaums were frankly pleased at their daughter's happy marriage, and that was the way they attested their pleasure—by making somebody else happy, too.

Elsie is Lame

Miss Elsie Sperry will be missed from many of the winter gatherings. She had announced that she was not going out much this winter, but since then she met with a painful accident to her foot which has made locomotion difficult. What seemed a simple injury, when treated by unskilful chiropodists, became a really serious injury which it will take some months to heal.

C. D. Robinson is going to the Yosemite in the spring to become a rival to Jorgensen, who is not very popular among the artists, possibly because he has a rich wife and possibly because he knows how to market his pictures. Robinson is the artist who a few years ago discovered a new Yosemite.

California is proud and justly so of her two Universities which for the moment occupy the centre of the stage by reason of the interest manifested in the outcome of the annual football match. To every native Californian the forthcoming contest is fraught with interest and eagerly does everybody follow the reports from the training quarters from day to day concerning the condition of the players. We understand that on the eve of the contest both of the teams are to be refreshed with Ayala so that the generous public are insured of a game of more than usual vim and vigor, and we are certain that the victors, be they who they may, will in the celebration of the victory be cheered and enthused with nothing else than that best of all champagnes, Ayala.

Mrs. Dick Sperry nee Marian Harrison has returned to her parental roof in Sausalito with her baby. The young husband has been welcomed to the Harrison home and peace is restored. The baby has been named Elizabeth Harrison Sperry in honor of the two grandmothers. She has inherited her mother's fascinating dimples.

The Patron of Fine Arts

A Benevolent Lady, whose fad was Art, and who liked to call herself a Bohemienne because she numbered many artists, musicians and writers among her friends, had one Especial Pet. He was a Young Artist with Enormous Talent, but whose wings had been Clipped by an Early Marriage. When he should have been painting Masterpieces, he was obliged to waste his Time and Colors on Pot-boilers. The Benevolent Lady bought some of the latter from him, and also ordered a Full-Length Portrait of herself, and secured commissions for her Protege from her Rich Friends. She introduced the Young Artist at teas and receptions and, as he was a Nice, Modest Chap with no Toadyish ideas, he speedily became a Lion.

When the Benevolent Lady had fully launched her Discovery on the Sea of Social Popularity, she bethought herself that he was a Married Man. She resolved, as she was a good woman of old-fashioned morals, that the Wife ought by all means to share in the Husband's social favor.

She thereupon asked Mrs. Artist to dinner, en famille, as she thought it better to introduce her tentatively as it were. Mrs. Artist did not care to go, but her Husband refused to consider a Regret, and so she donned her Best Gown and went. She was a commonplace little Woman, as the Benevolent Lady discovered after the second course. She did not appreciate her husband's Great Genius, and she preferred him to paint Potboilers to Masterpieces. Besides, she had no Taste, and dressed Atrociously. She expressed the opinion that Rich Food was bad for the digestion and she preferred Beer to Champagne.

Afterwards, the Benevolent Lady, with a sigh, decided that her duty lay in a New Direction. It was certainly her duty to educate Artists' Wives for their Husbands, and she determined to begin on This One.

She thereupon made it a Point to oversee Mrs. Artist's choice of Gowns. She introduced her to a Beauty Doctor, and to a Physical Culturist, and she instructed her in the Cultured Jargon of the Society Amateur. The artist's wife was not very Clever, but she did not lack Receptiveness or Imitative Faculty, and she Got On famously. She soon went beyond her Tutor, and perfected herself in such graces of Polite Society as Flirting and Counter-Flirting, and other arts of her Sex.

Now the Benevolent Lady had a Husband, who was not fond of her Cultured Friends. He seldom attended her Salons, because he considered them Dry. He said her clever friends were Not In It except on Conversation and Music, and he preferred a Variety Show.

He found a Congenial Mind in the Artist's Wife, who came frequently to dine with the Benevolent Lady. They soon learned how to carry on a Flirtation beneath the eyes of the Benevolent Lady, who was pursuing the path of Duty in Educating the Artist's Wife to appreciate her Husband. But Mrs. Artist, instead of learning to appreciate her own Husband, learned to appreciate the husband of the Benevolent Lady.

The result was that one day the Benevolent Lady found herself without a Husband, and the Young Artist found himself minus a Wife.

The moral is that it is always best to leave well enough alone. —The Fabler.

Herod to Salome

Salome! O Salome! if I might
But once more see my Mariamne's face,
And feel her breath upon me; watch the bright
Eyes foully dimmed by me, and note the grace,
That took me from my guilty self a space,
And showed me heaven, Salome, I would stand
Before God's bar, and claim in hell thy place,—
If so I might but once more touch her hand.

Salome, wicked sister! if the night
Would open wide and swallow my disgrace,
So that my sin no longer should me smite;
If kind oblivion would my crime efface,—
O, if beside her I could once more pace
The shady paths of Salem!—then thy brand
Of shame upon my brow I'd place,—
If so I might but once more touch her hand.

Thou instigator damned! O, may God's light
Be darkened to thine eyes! May thy small space
Of days be filled with hours that affright
The soul with dreadful visions of a place
Of awful dreams, and scalding tears that trace
Deep wrinkles, like the tide upon the sand!
God give to everlasting doom thy race!—
If so I might but once more touch her hand.

ENVOY.

Ye Princes and Dominions that pace
About the throne of God: a king I stand,
Offering Salome's soul for my queen's grace!—
If so I might but once more touch her hand.

"It's proud I am to know that I'm a Yankee. There's nothin' to it, Clancy, now that we've bin thoroughly assimilated be th' Irish, we ar're th' gr-reatest people on earth. We manip'late nashins as aisy as we joogle thrusts, an' we make billion dollar syndikates while you wait an' without a cint iv capital. As a wurruld power, Clancy, there's no shtoppin' us. Give us time an' we'll absorb th' earth, an' we'll do it in th' inthrist iv humanity an' Wall shtreet. Lukkit the way we tur'rned th' thrick in Pannima. It bates th' divvle how we attain our inds when we make up our minds. Lukkit th' Phlipeens an' now keep your eye on th' kinnal."

"Phwat have we been doin'?" asked Clancy.

"So you haven't been readin' th' pa-apers! I'm astonished at you. Sure, we've bin benevlintly assim'latin' th' Greezers; takin' up th' white man's burdin again, to enable th' constatooshin to follow th' flag. We've bin shtackin' th' cards in th' game iv diplomecy an' it's all over but th' shoutin'. The kinnal was th' shtake an' we won. We can take it home with us whiniver we want. You see, Clancy, we needed the kinnal in our business, because when we took th' Phlipeens we became a wurruld power, an' it behooved us to cut a hole through th' continent so that in case iv throuble we could bunch our naval vessels without sendin' them overland, which is both ixpensive an' slow. But th' queschin arose as to where th' hole should be locatid. Sinitorr Morrigan favored what was called Nickerawgwa, but John Peerpont Morrigan, who isn't a Sinitorr but who has a great many proxies in Washington, favored Pannima. He thought it th' better route because it was f'r sale. It was offered to th' Governmint f'r somethin' less than a billion dollars, an' whiniver there's a chance f'r a billion dollar deal John Peerpont always comes to th' front. When he isn't makin' Bishops he makes a speciality iv billion dollar transackshins, an' when he handles them there's always a little to go 'round where it'll do th' most good. Hinnery Watterson, iv Kentucky, says there's twenty millions to go round if Pannima goes through, so you can see it's no baggytel. John Peerpont sent it flyin' through our Sinnit but when it came to gettin' permishin from th' Columbyin governmint, which owned th' land where th' hole is to be, there was trouble. Th' dagoes wanted their share iv th' graft, an' they kept raisin' th' price until John Morrigan lost payshinse. Phwat did he do, sez you? He shtacked th' car-rds on th' dagoes. He's a shmart man, is Morrigan. Sez he to himself, sez he, it's aisier to buy half th' governmint than th' whole iv it. So he shtarted a revolushin in Columbya an' shplit th' counthry in two. Ye know, Clancy, anybody can shtart a revolushin in Central America. Revolushins are recognized social funkshins down there. They have to have them to shtimulate public interest in th' affairs iv governmint. So John Peerpont merely took advantage iv th' tempermint iv th' people, but first he arranged with his proxies at Washington to have ships on th' spot an' to offishally recognize th' revolushinists while not neglectin' to strew a few guns along th' route iv th' kinnal. The whole thing wur-rked like a char-rm. It was a mashter shtroke iv diplomecy. There was a time, Clancy, when we thought that John Bull was th' gr-reatest iv all diplomats. That was before we became a wurruld power. Up to that time John Bull played th' game jist as he plays all his nash'nal pastimes—slow an' with gr-reat delibrashin, as in chess an' crickitt, where you eat your meals bechune moves an' sometimes pause f'r an afternoon nap. When Uncle Sam broke into th' game, he introjuced th' tactics iv poker an' baseball, where you get quick ackshin f'r your money. If you see a chanst iv losin' you kill th' umpire. If you don't hold th' car-rds you run a bluff or call f'r a new deck an' shtack it. That's th' American game iv diplomecy."

"Do you think we'll keep th' kinnal?" asked Clancy.

"No, we'll only borrow it until we annex th' contigyus counthry."

The Stage

The Critic and His Nerves

Discussing critics, James Huneker of the New York Sun, one of the most learned critics in America, says: "We judge actors too much by our nerves and often float our pint of criticism in a gallon of prejudice." Mr. Huneker would be justified in his statement if he also applied it to plays and whole performances. The critic's nerves too often influence his judgment and nerves are seldom rational. They are moody and affected by organs that cannot be appealed to intellectually, and that bear a very remote relationship to the senses. An abnormal liver plays havoc with the nerves, and a disorganized stomach sets them on edge. It is impossible for a playwright or an actor to convince a critic through his nerves when dyspepsia is ravaging his vitals. Yet the success of a play, or the reputation of an actor, often depends on the word of a critic. Of course I mean a critic who enjoys the reputation of being honest in his criticisms, and there are such even among those who ocasionally write at the dictation of nerves. Some critics are not worth while. They sugar-coat their condemnation so deftly that it is hard to differentiate it from enthusiastic approval. They can't even damn a performance with faint praise, and as a consequence when they are highly pleased their exuberance is unconvincing. I prefer the critic with nerves even though they do occasionally get beyond his control.

LUKE CONNESS

A newcomer at the Alcazar is Luke Conness who is winning favor by his agreeable personality, and the versatility with which he has played such widely divergent roles as the Indian renegade in "The Cowboy and the Lady," and the eccentric English Squire in this week's production of "The Private Secretary." He has had extensive Eastern experience in stock and in support of leading stars. His brother, Robert Conness, is the romantic actor now starring as Robert Emmett.

Wright's Simonides

A performance that is worthy of more than casual comment is that of Stephen Wright in the role of Simonides in "Ben Hur." Mr. Wright is so unobtrusive, so indifferent to the little tricks by which the actor strains for effect, that at first you are apt to be unimpressed by the fidelity of the portrayal. It is a performance that grips you upon reflection, and then you suddenly realize that he is the character he enacts. His art is effortless. He has less opportunity than others in the cast to call attention to his conscientious and intelligent work, but it is unquestionably the best that is done. The play has been drawing well and will no doubt have a successful run. It is something more than a splendid spectacle: it is a fine play that reveals dramaturgic craftsmanship of a high order.

They Shied at Trousers

There are two irate and unhappy young women at the Alcazar. Adele Block, the lithe-limbed leading lady, and Frances Starr, the petite and appealing ingenue, have had their finer sensibilities rudely trampled beneath the iron heel of managerial oppression. It is a question of what constitutes becoming modesty in attire. In next week's farce, "The Club's Baby," Miss Block and Miss Starr personate comely young women who visit the club of husband and sweetheart to confirm certain jealous suspicions concerning the baby's paternity. To do this, in the guise of male visitors, they must assume the conventional masculine evening clothes. The swallow-tails and accordion pleated opera hats of fashion were not so bad but both drew the line at trousers. Miss Block said she would resign first. Miss Starr, with a torrent of tears, declared she would die first. Neither one pants for notoriety. The resultant conversation was stormy. The organization seemed about to be shipwrecked on the treacherous sands of acrimonious discusion. But the Alcazar's managerial life savers acted with artful diplomacy and both fair rebels were finally hauled ashore in the breeches buoy. They begged piteously for the enveloping shelter of mackintoshes, but their prayers were denied, and nothing will be left to the imagination. Meantime there are a few choice front row seats still remaining at the box-office.

WRIGHT HUNTINGTON

Mr. Huntington is one of the most popular leading men who ever appeared in San Francisco. He will reappear at the Orpheum Sunday afternoon, November fifteenth, in his great success, "A Stand Off," an exceedingly dainty and well blended sketch, abounding in comedy and pathos. Mr. Huntington will be ably supported by Florida Kingsley and Alex Kearney, both capable and recognized artists.

A Perennial Cattermole

John B. Maher is certainly a versatile actor. In his brief season at the Alcazar he has given evidence of his versatility as well as of his conscientiousness, which by the way is no unimportant trait in an actor. Mr. Maher is an artist to his finger-tips, and though he may play an old, familiar role, such as the Rev. Robert Spaulding in "The Private Secretary" which has become a modern farce-comedy classic, he relies on his own judgment of how it should be done, and consequently there is nothing reminiscent in his performance. He plays the part with quaint humor, and with satisfying naturalness. When the Rialto of San Francisco extends, at some future day, out to Presidio Heights, and some enterprising manager decides upon a revival of "The Private Secretary," he will in all probability drop into George Osbourne's mansion and urge the veteran actor to show the current generation how Mr. Cattermole should be played. No revival of "The Private Secretary" is complete without Osbourne as Cattermole. Though the role of Spaulding was intended as a star part Osbourne always manages to divide honors as the irascible East Indian. Mr. Durkin plays the somewhat juvenile role of Douglas Cattermole with the requisite light touches. Adele Block is a dainty Edith Maisland and Miss Starr is a breezy Eva Webster. On the whole the performance is a creditable one, and the work of the company is a guarantee that it will do justice to the comedies that are to follow in quick succession.

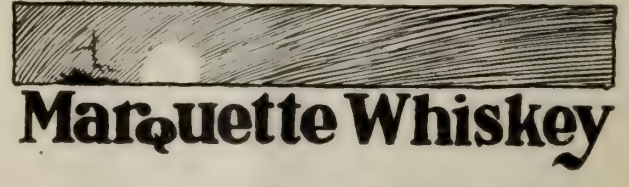
Tina as Tosca

Tina de Spada makes the hit of her career in dramatic circles as Floria Tosca in Puccini's opera at the Tivoli this week. The self-consciousness that frequently mars this singer's work was only apparent a few times during the action of the opera. The scene with Scarpia in the second act was managed very artistically and as a sustained piece of acting it was truly excellent. Tosca's horror of the dead body of Scarpia was shown with haunting effect and her scene with her lover in the last act was beautifully given, both vocally and dramatically. Zanini was the heavy villain Scarpia, and he played the part with a great deal of glowering and much grinding of teeth. Zanini is a very young man, and has not as yet learned the art that conceals art. His voice is not very musical, much of it being strident in the extreme. His acting in the first act, where he plots revenge on Tosca's lover, was very well done. Agostini sang the part of the artist Cavorradossi excellently except for a little forcing of the notes in his duets with De Spada. His acting was not so good.

Steindorff's Part in It

Though "Il Trovatore" was the alternating bill by desire, the audience on Tuesday night was not so large as the excellence of the cast warranted. There was not a false note in the whole opera, and the ensembles were particularly good. Ischierdo had to sing twice his solo in the fourth act, and Gregoretti of course had to repeat the "Stride la vampa." It doesn't seem right to force grand opera artists to sing encores, for their work is arduous enough without any additions. But Ischierdo's top note came out on the repetition with more clearness and ease, if anything, than on the first rendition. Benedetto's Leonora is one of the best things she does, and she received a deal of applause and flowers. Phyllis Partington filled her small role of Inez very acceptably. Her voice is not large but she has considerable dramatic ability, and her beauty is undeniable. Marchesini's Azucena was something to remember for its dramatic power. Travaglini, the Ferrando, has one of the best and most reliable voices in the company. I wonder how many people who have enjoyed these grand opera presentations ever give a thought to the work it entails on the leader. Paul Steindorff has managed to direct all the performances without having to apologize for any shortcomings, something that rarely happens in greater companies, and he still looks as fresh and unfatigued as when the season began. John Marquardt, who is playing first violin at the Tivoli now, is a strong addition to the orchestra.

The Penalty of Remotenesss



"The Mocking Bird," "Dolly Varden," "The Silver Slipper," "The Toreador," "The Wizard of Oz" and "When Johnny Comes Marching Home" are all musical comedies, which, though we have not seen them, have been exploited at least one season on Broadway and are now touring. We are dreadfully behind the times, but let us hope that the new Tivoli will regain its erstwhile enterprising spirit when it enters the new home, which, by the way, is making such slow progress that the management will probably have to open the comic opera season in the old house. Ferris Hartman has been picking up material for the comic opera season abroad and when he reaches New York soon he will try to secure the rights to some of the musical comedies which have had their season in Broadway. I hear that he has been instructed to open negotiations for "San Toy," the best little opera that has appeared since "The Geisha."

A Variety of Talent

Among the newcomers at the Orpheum this week are Phil and Nettie Peters, a comedy team who have quite a repertoire of gags, some of which are new and laugh-compelling. The team scored a hit. Albert Bellman and Lottie Moore are a talented team who have also made good. Max Waldron, the female impersonator, continues to excite interest by the grace with which he wears short-skirts and imitates dancing girls. Waldron is one of the best female impersonators that have ever appeared at the Orpheum. The two Roses do a very refined musical stunt up to the time that one of them sings. The song is refined but not the voice. However it is less offensive than that of the soprano in the village choir, which is the most solemn aggregation of vocal talent I have heard. Commencing next week the Orpheum will give an additional matinee every Thursday, making four regular matinees each week.

Why She Prefers Harned

Some one asked Virginia Harned the other day why she didn't call herself Virginia Sothern. Miss Harned, who is to show us what she can do with a Pinero part next week, has a quick wit. She promptly produced a railway guide and picked out all the names associated with the word Southern. "See," she said, "Cincinnati Southern, Canada Southern, Wisconsin Southern, Georgia Southern, Texas Southern—and there are others. Now, if I were heralded as Virginia Sothern—but, really, the point is too obvious." Virginia Harned, by the way, has not been to San Francisco for some time. She appeared here as Fanny in "Captain Letterblair," but I do not think San Francisco ever saw her Trilby. She created the part of the Du Maurier-Potter heroine in the East but Blanche Walsh was Trilby in the Chicago production and Edith Crane appeared in the role here. Miss Harned was the first to play Iris Bellamy in this country. Among the prominent members of the company to appear here in "Iris" are Henry Jewett and William Courtney.

bears the name of a great and good man and is good enough to deserve it. It is the finest and costliest whiskey distilled.

Brusie is the Man

The management of Fischer's is keeping the name of the librettist who has written a musical comedy, soon to be produced, a dark secret. I have learned that the gentleman is none other than Jud Brusie, the well-known lawyer and politician. Mr. Brusie has the reputation of being quite a wit, and if his comedy is all that it is represented to be by those who have read it his fame will not be slow in spreading far from O'Farrell street. I hear that the piece deals with labor union topics, and that Mr. Brusie has very cleverly satirized the customs of the professional agitators.

The Whims of a Star

Frank Worthing is again experiencing hard luck. Last season after scoring a big hit with Julia Marlowe he was thrown out of an engagement because the star did not like the play. It was said she was disgruntled because Worthing received nearly all the applause. This season he started out with Miss Marlowe again, in a new play, and once more the star became dissatisfied with the play. It was another splendid chance for Mr. Worthing, but he is once more out of an engagement. Miss Marlowe's present dissatisfaction, it is said, is due to the fact that she has failed to score as big a hit as has been made by those other Frohman stars, Maude Adams and Maxine Elliott. By the way, the statuesque Maxine is doing a tremendous business, while her husband, Nat Goodwin, has been compelled to wind up his season in "A Midsummer Night's Dream" because he did not receive satisfactory recognition.

Hall McAllister, the erstwhile clubman of this city, who surprised his friends about two years ago by deserting the bar to become an actor, is now playing a small part in "Vivian's Papas," a farce comedy which has been well received in New York. A Californian who saw McAllister in the play says that he does very well. He met McAllister at the Lambs' Club, and found him quite enthusiastic over the progress he has made in the profession.

Judging from what the London critics say about Bernard Shaw's latest, "Man and Superman," it is good reading but an unplayable drama. It is highly polemical but unconvincing. The trouble with Shaw is that he wishes to teach the world how the universe should be run. These are some of his epigrams: "The confusion of marriage with morality has done more to destroy the conscience of the human race than any other single error"; "Beauty, purity, respectability, religion, art, bravery and the rest, are nothing but words which I or any one else can turn inside out like gloves. They are mere words useful for duping barbarians into adopting civilization, or the civilized poor into submitting to be robbed and enslaved"; "Do not unto others as you would they should do unto you. Their tastes may not be the same."

Features of Next Week's Bills

The event will be the production of "Iris" at the Columbia. The play is not so old in the East as those we usually get, and we are to have the original exponent of the title part, with a good company. "Iris" is one of Pinero's most pungent problem plays and though it did not please the critics, from the box-office viewpoint it was an enormous success in New York. It is said to be the most realistic thing that Pinero ever did.

The first production here of Leoncavallo's "Zaza" at the Tivoli will bring to a brilliant close the grand opera season. "Zaza" follows very closely the lines of the play, and offers opportunity for dramatic as well as vocal flights. De Spada will have the title role, and Ischierdo will be Dufresne. Gregoretti, Dado and Cortesi will be of the cast. The alternating opera will be "I Puritani" in which Tromben, Tedeschi, Dado, Zanini, Cortesi and Miss Deglow will appear. It was found impossible to produce "The Marriage of Figaro," which was announced as a part of this season's repertory.

"Ben Hur" will crowd the Grand for its final fortnight. It is a great play, a magnificent spectacle, and it has the approval of the clergy as well as critics and public. There is a big rush for seats.

The Alcazar's offering, "The Club's Baby," has both New York and London prestige, but has never been seen here. There is a pungent dash of piquancy about the story of the precocious infant which is abandoned upon the door step of a swell club in London. The comic complications are involved and funny—none more so than the scene where a jealous young wife and her maiden confidante disguise themselves in masculine evening attire and, with bogus visitors' cards, gain admission to the club house. It is Adele Block and Frances Starr who are to assume trousers and tuxedos. For Thanksgiving week "A Poor Relation," in which Sol Smith Russell was so appealing, will be the bill. The Alcazar is the first stock company to present it.

The Central will eclipse all its former scenic and spectacular triumphs in the gorgeous production of "Under the Polar Star." Preparations have been in progress for weeks, scenic artists have wrought magnificent effects on the canvas, while the electricians have devised a scheme of varicolored lights whereby the Aurora Borealis will be pictured. The rarest feature of the play, however, will be the introduction of real Esquimaux in the Arctic scenes. Frederick Koltchoff, the noted Alaskan explorer, is in San Francisco, en route to New York, where he will winter his Arctic and Alaskan Exhibit for the St. Louis World's Fair, and the Central has made arrangements to have him put on the stage in "Under the Polar Star" his band of Esquimaux and his train of Esquimaux dogs, with Alaskan dog-sleds and all the accessories of that mode of travel over the waste of snow and ice. The Alaskans will be dressed in the furs and skins of the extreme North. The immense wolfish-looking dogs in Koltchoff's train hold the record for fast traveling at St. Michael's. One of the sensational sights will be the burning of an ice-imprisoned ship.

Wright Huntington will reappear at the Orpheum in "A Stand Off." Mr. Huntington will be supported by Florida Kingsley and Alex. Kearney. The three Zolars, direct from Europe, will have a new comedy acrobatic act. Serra and Bella-Rosa, another European importation, perform Samson-like feats of strength. Joe and Sadie Britton, who present what they call "the epitome of all colored acts," come back with a new turn. Albert Bellman and Lottie Moore will present "A Gallery Goddess," Warren and Blanchard will introduce new songs, and Phil and Nettie Peters will make a change of act. So popular have become the matinees at the Orpheum that, beginning the week of November twenty-second, an additional afternoon performance will be given every Thursday, making four regular matinees each week—Wednesday, Thursday, Saturday and Sunday.

"Rubes and Roses" continues to draw capacity audiences to Fischer's. The play is one of the most pretentious yet put on at this house. The Althea Twins, a new sister team, will appear in the next new production at Fischer's.

At the Chutes will be Marsh and Sartella, direct from New York; John Ressley and Marie Rostelle, presenting "A Widow's Courtship," and the Volkyras, European gymnasts and hand balancers. Queen, Stowe and Feely will offer their acrobatic absurdity, "The Joss House Dodger," Wayne and LaMar, singing and dancing comedy sketch artists, will vary their specialty and Mabel Lamson, the Chutes' favorite, will have new illustrated songs.

The fifth annual benefit under the auspices of the Associated Theatrical Managers of San Francisco, in aid of their charity fund for the sick and needy in the profession, will take place at the Columbia next Friday afternoon. William J. Kelly, who plays Ben Hur in Grand production, will read the description of the chariot race, Julia A. Herne, daughter of the late James Herne and the Esther of "Ben Hur," will be heard in soprano solos. Virginia Harned and her company will present an act of "Iris," while the Alcazar's contribution will be the third act of "Lady Bountiful." Rose Melville, the original "Sis Hopkins," and her company, will appear, the best artists from the Tivoli grand opera company will sing, supported by the chorus and directed by Paul Steindorff, and the second act of "At Valley Forge" will be staged. There will be some of the best turns known to modern vaudeville besides. —The Playgoer.

The decrease in the reserves of the New York banks and the growing demand for funds for the moving of crops has caused a stiffening of the rates of interest East, which is not without effect on our local conditions.

The demand for money locally is quite brisk and made itself felt in a more pronounced degree inasmuch as the activity of the Real Estate market has been quite a factor in the absorption of loanable surpluses.

Transactions on "The Stock and Bond Exchange" amounted to $132,000 in bonds, and 2,295 in shares of stocks divided as follows: 935 Gas & Electric, 510 Water, 685 Sugars, 165 Miscellaneous. San Francisco Gas & Electric advanced about $1.50, the buying evidently being for the "inside." Spring Valley Water declined about a point, apparently without any reason. Miscellaneous stocks showed no change whatever. Sugar stocks showed considerable strength on highly satisfactory reports from the Plantations. Knowing ones talk so confidently about early dividends that it might be worth while to give them a little attention.

MUSIC

[Communications addressed to this department should be received not later than Wednesday noon.]

A Friday of Music

Concert-goers had hard work to choose where to go last Friday night, for there was something doing in music in four halls—the Alhambra, Steinway, Lyric and Native Sons'. Though the audience that gathered in the Alhambra was not large, it was critical and enthusiastic, and enjoyed the program presented by Chiafferelli and his men. There were nine numbers, but these were increased by encores. The band this season is really a fine organization and the leader is full of fire. Ellery's band will be back next month to give another series of concerts under Will Greenbaum's direction, and they will receive a hearty welcome.

From the Alhambra to the Lyric is but a step. At the latter the attraction was a concert by Frederick M. Biggerstaff, the pianist, assisted by Mrs. Edward F. Schneider, mezzo soprano, and Edward F. Schneider, accompanist. There was a very large audience of smart people present, and the program presented was full of enjoyment to the cultured hearers. Mr. Biggerstaff gave works of Brahms, Chopin, Schumann, Arensky, Korestchenko, Liadow, Rubinstein and Moszkowski with a fine understanding and brilliant technic. Particularly worthy was his interpretation of Chopin in the Sonata op. 35. Mrs. Schneider sang three of her composer-husband's works, two of Tschaikowsky's and two by Von Fielitz, covering a wide range of expression. Her voice is of grand opera timbre, her tone large and full of warmth. Mr. Schneider accompanied sympathetically, and shared in the applause following the rendition of his own songs.

A very delightful recital was that in Steinway hall, given by the vocal pupils of Mrs. Grace Davis Northrup and the violin pupils of Alexander T. Stewart. There was an air of freshness and youth about it, and the participants brought an enthusiasm to their work that communicated itself to the audience. The program was a long one, and there were no hitches in its rendition. The numbers by the choral class consisting of twenty-two voices were given with vim and admirable harmony and tempo. The violin ensemble numbers were also noteworthy for harmony and time. Eighteen violins formed the ensemble, directed by Mr. Stewart. Carl Bohm's "Perpetual Motion" was given with remarkable brilliancy.

In Native Sons' hall another immense audience was gathered to listen and applaud the work of Joseph Greven's pupils in their sixth costumed recital. The first part of the program was given up to numbers rendered by the younger pupils and the latter half to those more advanced. The San Francisco Conservatory Orchestra under T. D. Herzog's direction rendered the instrumental setting and also played the opening number, "Rameses," Egyptian intermezzo by Tony Stanford. There were scenes from "Maritana," "Tyrolean Mountain," "The Mikado," "Pirates of Penzance," and "Boccaccio," all in costume, the various singers entering well into the spirit of their work, though they showed signs of nervousness. But it was in the grand opera numbers of the latter part of the program that the effect of Mr. Greven's training was more particularly shown. This included an aria from "Robert le Diable" and the "Voi che Sapete" from "Le Nozze di Figaro" by Miss Mabel Jackson Christes, selections from "Mignon" by Miss Zita Fahey, a "Tannhauser" aria and "Elsa's Dream" with a moderato from the "Lucia" aria by Mrs. Lenore Greven, and bits from three acts of "Il Trovatore" by Miss Maude Crabtree and J. E. Ericson. Mrs. Greven won great applause for the Wagner numbers. She has made a special study of the works of Wagner, and her large, full soprano is well suited for their interpretation. In such a long program one could not mention in detail the voices and rendition of every pupil.

Patti has thirty-five exquisite Parisian frocks to wear on her tour. She wears a different gown at every concert. She had to make formal affidavit on her arrival in New York that these dresses will all go back to Europe within six months. They will be sent from New York in small batches to meet the singer wherever she may happen to be at the time. They have been graded in weight according to the climate, heavy costumes being made for the Canadian cities and light and feathery ones for her concerts in New Orleans and other Southern and Western cities.

Considerable musical talent is possessed by the heirs and heiresses of our smart people, as was clearly shown at Century hall last Saturday, when a concert was given for a charitable purpose and all the participants were juveniles. Representatives from the Eyre, Page, Girvin, McLaren, Moore, Tallant, Crocker, Winslow, Otis, Sherman and other families took part in the program, and the Columbia Park boys sang choruses. Maria Roeckel gave in costume the spinning and jewel scene from "Faust" and her little brother Mario sang the prologue from "Pagliacci." These clever twins are now rehearsing the duo in "Mignon."

The nineteenth free organ recital at Trinity church will take place Wednesday evening, November eighteenth, when Louis H. Eaton will be assisted by Una Fairweather, contralto. The organ numbers are by Bach, Rheinberger, Capocci, Wolstenholme, Selby. An interesting number will be the Prelude and "Angel's Farewell" from Elgar's "Dream of Gerontius," which is attracting a great deal of attention in Europe and America. It will be the first time any of this music has been heard in San Francisco. Miss Fairweather will sing one number by Elgar.

It doesn't seem possible that Marcia Van Dresser's voice has attained grand opera dimensions, but her press agent says it has. She has been studying abroad and will debut in grand opera this season. Marcia's voice was almost like Isadore Rush's when she sang here with the Bostonians. Its quality was contralto, but there seemed to be very little of it.

Miss Lillian Slinkey entertained all the Tivoli grand opera artists on Monday afternoon, at a reception. Her studio at 809 Leavenworth street was crowded between the hours of two and six. She was hostess at an opera party on Tuesday evening to hear "Il Trovatore."

In Melba's concert company this season are Senorita Sassoli, a fifteen-year-old harpist who is the diva's protegee, Charles Gilibert, basso, Ellison Van Hoose, tenor, and Charles North, flutist.

Absence Makes the Heart Grow Fonder

Katherine Fisk's husband is a teacher in the Chicago High School. He does not object to his wife's concert tours. A Chicago woman who is visiting here told me that Mr. Fisk's pupils gauged his temperature by his wife's presence or absence. He is always exceedingly irritable when she is in town, but very angelic when she is on tour.

Two Californian "Babes"

"Babes in Toyland," of which I wrote last week, is still the reigning sensation of the New York theatrical field. Such music, such gayety of action, such pretty girls, such freshness and sparkle were never seen before. There are two people in it of some interest to San Francisco folks. They are Miss Susie Kelleher and Miss Virginia Foltz. Both are in the chorus but that means they are getting experience. Great things are expected of Susie Kelleher, for she has inherited talent. Her mother was Susan Galton, who was for years the most popular soubrette in this country and in England, and her aunt is Mrs. Thomas Whiffen who is still on the stage. Her father is Captain Alfred Kelleher, who was once a professional singer, and who while teaching in this city developed several of our most noted Californian songsters, prominent among whom was Emma Nevada.

It was during the first week of the English opera festival in Boston by Henry W. Savage's great English singing company. A young couple in the front row attracted attention. The man was from the city and his "company" was evidently a country cousin from Haverhill. He could not resist the temptation to extemporize on the technical mysteries of tonal relations as exemplified in Puccini's masterpiece. She was patient for a time, but finally, frowning her unloveliest, she said:

"Now, see here, Dick, I don't know counterpoint from Irish point, but won't you please let me enjoy the opera?"

Across the Bay

The directors of the Oakland Y. M. C. A. reckoned well the pulse of their public when they decided upon giving two big festival concerts for the benefit of the new auditorium. The affairs were enormously successful in every way. On Monday night the Macdonough held a very large audience and it was the same Tuesday night, I hear. Dado and Borghesi were loaned by the Tivoli for the concerts. The former was in fine form on Monday evening, making his greatest hit with the "Don Carlos" romanza. The chorus showed admirable training, and the orchestra under Pietro Marino's direction was superb. Mrs. Davis-Northrup was in perfect voice, and all the other singers did well. Dr. H. J. Stewart conducted two movements of his 'Montezuma" suite, and the number went even better than it did with Scheel's symphony orchestra. Of the choruses "The Pilgrims" from "Tannhauser" seemed to be the favorite. There has not been a finer concert given in Oakland, or indeed in San Francisco either, for years.

Miss Dorothy Goodsell sang in a duet with Mrs. Birmingham last week at a concert given in Steinway hall, and it was remarked how well their voices blended. The duet was from "Pygmalion and Galatea."

William C. Carl, the New York organist, recently sent his old friend, Marcus M. Henry of this city, a very valuable gift. It is a bit of antique Austrian art.

Miss Grace Freeman will give a violin recital in Y. M. C. A. Auditorium next Thursday evening, assisted by Mrs. F. A. Berlin, soprano, and Henry Salz, pianist. —The Music Critic.

The Scolding of London

The literary critic of Munsey's is scolding Jack London for "scolding at editors" because they have not accepted all his stories as simple transcripts of the truth. Evidently the Munsey diatribe was inspired by Mr. London's recent essay in the Critic, "Truth Stranger Than Fiction," in which case the objector has read it to little purpose if he finds therein any resemblance to a "scolding." Mr. London is, as yet, too earnest about what he is saying and doing to be self-conscious enough to give thought to how he looks while he is doing it. His essay sets forth simply and conclusively the plain fact that people will not accept as truth the relation of incidents which much transcend their own experiences. He does not complain, he does not scold and he does not blame. He simply checks the editorial rejections of his stories against his own incredulity with regard to the experiences others have related to him and which he has afterward learned to believe because he himself had seen. It must be a superficial and unsympathetic reader who can find anything resembling a "scolding" in this: Mr. London had written an account of one of his adventures, which was returned to him with the comment that the thing could not have happened. He wrote back criticising the criticism, and adds: "They were very nice about it, taking my criticism in better part than I took theirs; and, for that matter, they could afford to, for they were in the right. It is incontrovertible that one cannot do on the printed page what one does in life." (Italics are mine.) Again, a projected series of tramp tales came to grief because the first one was uniformly rejected by unbelieving editors. One, only, was convinced, and he solely because he had made the acquaintance of a young writer who had himself tramped. "Had I not known Mr. Jones for some time past," writes this editor, "I should have said such a creation as your Tramp was absolutely and utterly impossible, and my reason for rejecting the MS. is that to other people who have not had the opportunity to really understand what a tramp may be and into what he may be transformed, it might seem too great a tax on credulity." Mr. London concludes that "Actual events are less true than logical conceits and whimsicalities. And the man who writes fiction had better leave fact alone. I said to myself that the mosquito-man lied. By innumerable editorial rejections I have been informed that I have lied." This is a long way from the mourning-dove plaint which usually greets editorial rejections, and it is not the first time by any means that Mr. London has endorsed editorial decisions which have been adverse to his own contributions. There are comparatively few young writers who have common sense at their command to teach them that the powers of the literary world are not combined to crush their genius. Elsewhere he has written just as earnestly and vehemently on the justification of publishers in "buying names," paying better prices to those who have arrived than to novices and frankly admitting that if a name is worth nothing in this way there is no advantage in earning a reputation. All the "scolding" which has been administered is that of the critic, who has belabored the author.

Choice French Literature

Mr. William R. Jenkins deserves the thanks of the student as well as the general reader of French for his "Romans Choisis." These are the choicest specimens of French fiction selected for their wholesome tone and high literary value. Number three of the list is "Le Mariage de Gerard," by Andre Theuriet. Theuriet is a member of the Academy and one of the foremost of contemporaneous French writers. He is especially successful in the delineation of provincial types. The present tale is one of unusual interest, being a well constructed story told with the highest art of the novelist. The events take place in the vicinity of Bar-le-Duc in Lorraine. The beautiful setting of country scenes adds much to the story while many of its incidents are closely inwoven with the local customs. Gerard de Seigneulles is a young man of twenty-three, strictly brought up and just escaped from the bondage of the law school. His first escapade is the innocent one of attending a public ball at Saules, where he conducts himself as awkwardly as may be imagined. When the news reaches the ears of his father the Chevalier, he resolves to marry the young man out of hand, and selects an appropriate parti in the person of Georgette Grandfief, an heiress of the neighborhood. Gerard however obstinately falls in love with Helene Laheyrard, daughter of a professor lately arrived from Paris. Helene is a natural girl, very unlike the usual jeune fille of French novels, and her unconventionality, added to her Parisian taste in dress, render her the object of hatred and envy to her provincial neighbors. Their malice is not lessened by the devotion of Gerard to one beneath him in social station, and the young girl, in an outburst of pride, at last resolves to leave the place and accept a position as teacher in a Paris school. The worst construction is put upon her sudden departure, and the malicious stories at last reach the ear of Gerard's father. The irate old man believes that his son's honor is involved in marrying Helene and he is now as anxious to push forward the match as he was formerly opposed to it. Sufficient to say that events at last converge to a happy ending. The characters of the novel are well drawn; each one is really a character. The disorderly Laheyrard menage, sly Madame Grandfief listening at the door when she leaves Georgette and Gerard alone, the malicious hunchback Finoel, the mischief making grisette Reine Lecomte, the exuberant Marius, are all drawn by a sure hand. The incidents of the story are well contrived, and owe not a little of their interest to the way in which they give us the kernel of provincial thought and life. Such are the Grandfief ball, the hunt picnic, and the heady pleasures of the vintage. Delicious, too, are Georgette's remorse after the stolen kiss on the stairs, and the scene where Madame Grandfief consents to her daughter's marriage with Marius Laheyrard. Much can be said in praise of the explanatory notes in English by Ralph Emerson Bassett, professor of Romance languages in the University of Kansas. [Published by William R. Jenkins, 851 and 853 Sixth avenue, New York.]

Stories of the Sea

In "The Strife of the Sea" T. Jenkins Hains has collected eleven short stories, most of which relate to the lives of the denizens of the deep. They are related sympathetically from the point of view of the animals, and without any of the maudlin sentimentality unfortunately so common of late years. Mr. Hains leaves his pelicans, his whales, his turtles and his albatrosses as God created them. They are not transformed into creatures half human and as wholly unreal as mermaids, but are still birds, fish and mammals with strong instincts and rudimentary reason. Though the author assures us that these are imaginative tales they carry with them the vividness of reality and genuineness. Most of them have a human element and it will be a faint heart that does not beat in sympathy with the foolhardy lightkeeper who let a giant ray tow his boat or the captain of the Cape Horner who owed his salvation to the albatross which he had tamed. "The Sea Dog" is a minor version of "The Call of the Wild," but in this instance the poor dog was driven to a wild life by the unkind reception accorded him when he swam ashore from a wreck. While "The Strife of the Sea" should interest both young and old amongst those who enjoy stories of salt-water life, it can be especially recommended for boys. Being entirely free from profanity, they can be safely left to enjoy it in their own way, and at the same time pick up facts concerning the habits and lives of the sea-folk. The author has followed the sea both for business and for pleasure, and his "Wind-Jammers," published a few years ago, is not yet forgotten, even in these days when the best-seller of last month cannot be recalled by name. [Published by the Baker & Taylor Company, New York.]

Grievance of French Writers

It is reported that French authors and artists are demanding that publishers shall use a better quality of paper and ink for their books, being moved to protest by the fear that the wood-pulp paper and chemical ink will decay, and "masterpieces" disappear in the course of a century if something is not done. They demand that at least the two copies deposited for copyright purposes shall be printed in such manner as to insure reasonable permanency. This complaint is but an echo of that which arose in America a few years ago, but as yet nothing has been done about it. The French writers have the greater grievance, since the quality of materials is, on the whole, much worse than that which is used in our country, but before making such an outcry over the preservation of books it might be something to the purpose to make the books better worth preservation. Very few are worthy of a second edition even in their own day, and their is no particular reason to anticipate the deprivation of our grandchildren in losing a lot of third-rate novels. Even scientific works become simply curiosities to a later age, when the inventions and discoveries of which they treat have become familiar, and as each generation makes its own style, it is not likely that our histories and geographies will be in special demand at the end of the twentieth century, even though they should remain uncontradicted by later discoveries. It is by no means a gloomy outlook to contemplate a generation having to begin again without dead literary hands stretched out to stay them, and so far as the preservation of masses of printed matter is concerned, sometimes it looks seriously as if we shall have to solicit government appropriation to provide for the destruction, just as there is a periodic relief voted for the clearing of the Florida rivers, which become clogged by the growth of aquatic plants brought thither by "beauty lovers."

For Lovers of Horseflesh

David Gray's "Gallops II" will please lovers of bright short stories in general and horse-lovers in particular. The people are the same that we met in "Gallops I." They are wealthy, well-bred and amusing, and their fad is horseflesh. They can all trace the pedigree of their stables back almost to the original five-toed equine. They talk horse, think horse, buy, sell and trade horses, and play all sorts of pranks upon each other with the assistance of their horses. Fractures and dislocations they take as a matter of course and regret them only when their accidents prevent them from taking part in a race or a hunt. In that sad story of "The Echo Hunt" we find the Wharton infants schooling their broomsticks and laths over the jumps and dragging the unwilling pugs and poodles about for a pack of fox hounds. The Gallops are all clean and wholesome and Mr. Gray has made his subject so entertaining that even those who know no more about horses and hounds than "The Braybrooke Baby's Godmother," or Reggie Livingston's wife, cannot fail to be interested. It is a foregone conclusion that those who meet the parishioners of "St. Thomas Equinus" now for the first time will want to know what they did before, while the ones who have read "Gallops I" will be equally ready to continue the acquaintance. Most of the stories are reprinted from the Century Magazine, a recommendation in itself. [Published by the Century Company, New York.]

The Toledo Touring Car

This is the Toledo which won seven races at Ingleside Nov. 6, 7, 8. We used a stock car taken from our salesroom, removed the body and surplus fittings and made the best showing of any machine at the races.
Toledo won Endurance contest between New York and Pittsburg—800 miles—defeating 33 other makes of automobiles; lost only 13 minutes during entire race, which is the best record ever made by any touring car in any contest. A violent storm raged for four days; trains were delayed 24 hours. Express was discontinued for several days. Telegrams 8 to 12 hours late. Yet the Toledo went through on schedule time. The Toledo won the hill-climbing contest at Del Monte races.

Five miles open were defeated by the White who made the time in 6:30 4-5, which is slower than we made in any of the three races in which we defeated the White. Moreover, we used no windshields. The Toledo met the White Touring Car in 4 races. Toledo won 3—6:25 1-4, 6:24 1-2, and 12:29. White won 1—6:30 4-5. The Toledo's winning times of 6:25 1-4 and 6:24 1-2 were lower than the White's of 6:30 4-5.

The Toledo which did this work is a regular stock machine and is for sale at the regular price.

Automobile Topics

The long expected race meet of the Automobile Club of California is now over but the event and the thrilling rides of Barney Oldfield will no doubt long linger in the minds of thousands who journeyed to the race track. The meet was a most successful one. Magnificently was the speed competition begun and very fittingly was the notable meeting closed. Barney Oldfield is certainly the king of all the exponents of this dangerous sport. The auto wizard proved he was a champion on Sunday, when he covered that mile oval at Ingleside in fifty-six seconds. He was put one-fifth of a second short of his record of fifty-five and one-half seconds. That mile made at Ingleside was the fastest that the Bullet No. 2, a Winton machine, ever negotiated the distance in, and Oldfield states that he considers it the best ride he has ever made, though he declares the local track the worst he has ever driven on. Had the track been as good as the Empire City track that same mile in "fifty-six" would have been made in fifty-two seconds. Oldfield on each day won the hearts and praise of the fair ones and the admiration of the men. To the throng that witnessed the three days' sport Barney was a revelation. He undoubtedly was the magnet that drew the thousands of people to the track and he was well worth seeing. Hatless, wearing goggles, loose negligee shirt and looser trousers, as though he were out for a tennis game, he hops into his time-destroyer, takes the steering wheel in his right hand and the throttle in his left and is off. He dashes along the outer rail of the straights as if to see how close he could come to the fence without splintering the pickets, and turning the corners he hugs the inner rail as though it were his best god. This system of driving makes his every mile a long one, but it does not diminish his speed. The extreme ease with which he handled his machine and the superb work that he accomplished with it made competition less keen than otherwise it might have been, but even in the absence of close finishes the crowds were delighted.

The performance during the meeting, of the National Automobile Company's Toledo touring car, driven by W. E. Saunders, was really wonderful. That one car, a gasoline stock machine, won seven events, five of which were first places, and this horseless vehicle is the fastest gasoline stock machine made in the United States. In the five mile event on Friday for gasoline cars of twenty-four horse power Saunders piloted the Toledo to victory in 6:45 4-5. In the five mile open event for California-owned machines on the same day the Toledo was again a winner, this time covering the distance in 6:25 1-5 and defeating the twelve thousand dollar Mors machine and also the White driven by F. A. Garbutt. Twice again on the second day did this speeding touring car distance all its competitors. In the five mile event for cars of twenty-four horse power the Toledo won in 6:24 4-5, and in the seventh event, also a five mile race, the National Company's crack modern chariot again captured the highest honors, beating Pierre Desmet in the Mors for first place. On the closing day of the meeting, in the gasoline car race, thirty-five horse power and under, the Toledo was once more victorious, beating the Franklin racer for first place.

The little Franklin racer owned by Messrs. E. C. Ford and F. A. Jacobs, which holds all records for a small machine, did itself proud in the race meeting. The little Champion on several occasions during the three days finished first, and each time was operated by W. F. Winchester.

The little Oldsmobile was almost invincible on the opening day of the auto races at Ingleside. On Friday this speedy little machine of the Pioneer Automobile Company won high honors and first prizes in two events. In the opening race, a two-mile for gasoline cars only, six and one-half horse power and under, the Olds took the lead at the start and was never hard pressed. This little horseless carriage also annexed the handicap race, the last event of the first day.

The White Sewing Machine Company is deserving of credit for its assistance in making up the entries for these races. It entered its ten-horse power cars against machines of all horsepowers, whether it had any chance of winning or not, and on Sunday, in the ten-mile free-for-all, it made the only entry against Oldfield. In the three days' racing the "White" won twelve prizes. In the race on Friday for cars of eighteen hundred pounds and under, Walter Grothe in a ten horsepower stock "White" touring car actually beat Barney and his "Baby Bullet," though that was when Barney made slow time. He also defeated Whittell's "Mors" in the fast time of 6:04 2-5. This was an average speed of a trifle less than 1:13 to the mile. The fastest miles were the last two, both of which were made in 1:09 4-5, a speed of fifty-one and one-half miles an hour.

Harold B. Larzelere of the Pacific Motor Car Company has returned from the East, where he visited all the big factories and principally the new one of the Packard people. Mr. Larzelere said that the Pacific Motor Car Company is to have an expert man in Mr. Dohrmann, to take charge of their garage. He was the former superintendent of the well known American Garage in New York. "The garages in the East," continued Mr. Larzelere, "for equipment and size cannot begin to compare with those of our home city."

The Pioneer Automobile Company is much elated over the success of its machines at the race meet. In addition to the laurels won by the Winton racing machines, the Oldsmobile won every race in its class, defeating several well known machines of considerable more horse-power. Barney Oldfield is enthusiastic over the treatment he has received on this coast, and he says that conditions here are such as to be conducive to fast racing. He believes it possible for him to break his record on the Ingleside track. Mr. Charles Graham, who accompanied Mr. Oldfield on the trip and who drove the "Baby Bullet" at Ingleside, bids fair to become a second Barney. He is an intimate friend of Mr. Alexander Winton, the builder of the famous Winton touring cars.

Mr. W. F. Hunt of San Jose has formed a connection with the Pioneer Automobile Company and will have full charge of the mechanical department. He has the reputation of being one of the best gasoline experts in the country.

A Challenge

Knowing that the Toledo is the best all around touring car for general use made in the United States, we make the following proposition to any dealer handling automobiles in the city of San Francisco.

We will deposit Five Hundred Dollars ($500) with the Secretary of the Automobile Club of California, a like amount to be deposited by the Agent of any other stock automobile handled in San Francisco. We will agree to defeat the competing machine or donate the $500 to the Automobile Club of California. In case we win, we shall draw back our $500, and the loser shall donate his $500 to the Club. In case the owner of the competing machine deems twenty-five miles too short a distance to test the merit of his machine, we are willing to extend the distance up to 100 miles. In case this offer is accepted by the White Sewing Machine Co. on behalf of the White touring car, we will agree to give them a handicap of one-half a mile for each twenty-five miles to be run.

Salmon (Executrix of the Last Will of Francis Salmon, Deceased,) John Doe, Richard Roe, James Black, Mary Green and Mary Doe, also all other persons unknown, claiming any right, title estate, lien or interest in the real property described in the complaint adverse to Plaintiff's ownership, or any cloud upon Plaintiff's title thereto, Defendants

Action brought in the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and the Complaint filed in the office of the Clerk of said City and County of San Francisco.

The People of the State of California send Greeting to:

A. C. Freese (Administrator of the Estate of Pierre Langaron deceased), Eleanora O Salmon, Eleanora O. Salmon (as Trustee) Louise Emile Salmon, Francis Salmon, Alfred Salmon, Eleanora Alexandrina Salmon, Joseph Reavilo, also known as Jose Raviolo, otherwise known as Jose Raviola, Jean Marcellin Pourguery, Tomas Pidello, Guillaume Pache, Jean Pache, Gaspard Sadony, Eleanora O Salmon (Executrix of the Last Will of Francis Salmon, deceased) John Doe, Richard Roe James Black, Mary Green and Mary Doe, also all other persons unknown, claiming any right, title, estate, lien or interest in the real property described in the complaint adverse to Plaintiff's ownership, or any cloud upon Plaintiff's title thereto

YOU ARE HEREBY DIRECTED to appear and answer in an action entitled as above, brought against you in the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, within ten days after the service on you of this Summons—if served within this County; or within thirty days if served elsewhere.

And you are hereby notified that, unless you appear and answer as above required, the said Plaintiff will take judgment for any money or damages demanded in the complaint, as arising upon contract or he will apply to the Court for any other relief demanded in this complaint.

That the property involved in and affected by said action is described as follows, to wit:

All that certain lot, piece or parcel of land, situate, lying and being in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, commencing at a point where the Northerly line of Union street intersects the Easterly line of Dupont street; thence running Easterly along said line of Union street Twenty-three (23) feet; thence at right angles Northerly Thirty-four (34) feet and four and one-half (4½) inches thence at right angles Westerly Twenty-three (23) feet to the said Easterly line of Dupont street, and thence Southerly and along said line of Dupont street Thirty-four (34) feet and four and one half (4½) inches to the point of commencement.

That the object of said action is to obtain a judgment and decree of the above entitled Court adjudging and determining that the above named defendants and all other persons claiming any right, title, estate, lien or interest in the real property described in the plaintiff's complaint adverse to plaintiff's ownership or any cloud upon plaintiff's title thereto have not, and that none of them has any estate, right, title, lien or interest whatever in or to said real property, or in or to any part or parcel thereof, and that the title of plaintiff is good and valid, and that said defendants and all of said persons unknown as aforesaid be forever enjoined and debarred from asserting any claim whatever in or to said real property, or in or to any part or parcel thereof adverse to the plaintiff, and for such other, further and additional relief as to the Court may seem meet and proper in the premises, and for costs of suit.

Stories of Below-Stairs

Absent-Minded Marie

A German merchant had a servant girl who was excellent in many respects, but forgetful. This fault was especially annoying at meal times, when something essential was sure to be lacking from the dinner table. One day the family was seated at the table and the bell was rung as usual. The girl hurried to the dining-room.

"Marie," said Herr B., "just run and fetch the big step ladder down from the attic and bring it here."

Marie, who had been disturbed at her dinner, gave a grunt of dissatisfaction, but ran up the three flights of stairs to fetch down the heavy ladder. In about five minutes she returned to the room panting with the exertion.

"So now," said Herr B., "put it up at the end of the room and climb to the top."

Marie did as she was told, and when she was at the top Herr B. quietly observed:

"Marie, you have now got a better view than we have; just look round and tell us if you can see any salt on the table. My wife and I could not find it."

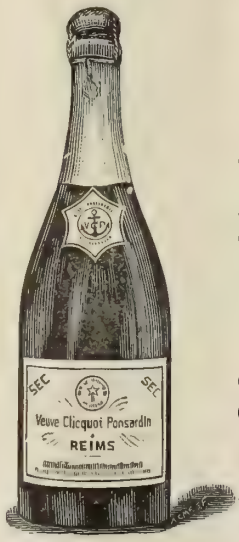
Marie never forgot the lesson.

She Got a Tip

Lady Carrington used to tell this story with much amusement: One day a South Australian magnate called at the Government House of New South Wales. He sent his card in, and, waving the footman aside, said he would go up and give his lordship a surprise. At the top of the stairs, he met a nice-looking young woman, and, in a fine, old-gentlemanly, gallant way, chucked her under the chin and pressed half-a-crown into her hand, saying at the same time:

"Show me into the presence of his lordship, my little dear."

The little dear, with an enigmatical smile, opened the door of Lord Carrington's study, and said:



"Bob, here's a gentleman to see you, and"—opening her hand—"he's given me half-a-crown to show him where you are."

A Careful Gardener

Buffon, the naturalist, one day entertained a company of savants at dinner, at the conclusion of which they all went out into the garden. It was a summer's day. In the centre of the grounds there stood on a pedestal a large glass globe, which one of the guests happened to touch with his hand, when he found, to his astonishment, that it was warmer on the shady side than on the side turned toward the sun. What could be the cause? An animated discussion ensued, in the course of which every imaginable law of physics was made to account for the paradox. At length the scientists agreed that it must be so, owing to the laws of reflection, repulsion, or exhalation, or some other law of physics with a long name. The host was, however, not quite convinced. Calling the gardener, he said:

"Pray, tell us why the globe is warmer on the shady side than on the side turned to the sun?"

"Because just now I turned it round for fear of its cracking with the heat," was the composed reply.

VIRGINIA HARNED

The distinguished actress who has given the public something to talk about by her presentation of Pinero's sensational play "Iris" at the Columbia Theatre

Our Puny Squadron

There is not at the present time a single battleship on the entire Pacific coast, nor, indeed, within the whole vast territory of the Pacific Squadron of the United States Navy, a territory larger than that covered by any of the other fleets, taking in as it does both the North and South Pacific oceans, from Arctic to Antarctic, and from the American continent to the longitude of Kamchatka, where the Asiatic station begins. The Pacific squadron has been denuded of ships to such an extent that at the present time it has but two armor-clads, only one of which—the New York, now on Puget Sound—is worthy of consideration as a fighting ship for any serious work. There is no prospect of this state of affairs being remedied in the near future. It will be fully a year before the battleship Ohio, now under construction at the Union Iron Works, will be completed, and the only chance for reinforcement is by the recall of the Oregon, the Kentucky, or the Wisconsin, from the Asiatic station. It is not likely that either the Kentucky or the Wisconsin will be brought back, as they have not been long in Asia. In spite of its enormous extent, the Pacific station has now but six vessels to patrol it, namely, the New York, which is an armored cruiser, and an efficient ship, second only to battleships in power; the small monitor Wyoming, which is the other armor-clad; the second-class cruiser Boston, the third-class cruser Marblehead and the gunboats Bennington and Concord. This is anything but an imposing array, particularly when contrasted with the vessels on the North Atlantic and on the Asiatic stations. The North Atlantic station, which covers the North Atlantic ocean from the equator north, is now divided into three squadrons, which include no less than seven battleships, two cruisers of the first class and one of the second class, a couple of modern gunboats, three monitors and a long list of auxiliary cruisers, gunboats, "destroyers" and torpedo-boats. The Asiatic station is also a large one, divided into two separate squadrons. Owing to the few ships in his command, Rear-Admiral Henry Glass, Commander-in-Chief of the Pacific station, has been forced to hoist his flag upon the small cruiser Marblehead, hardly an appropriate vessel for a flagship. The New York is in need of many repairs, and the Navy Department, it is understood, is to order her all the way around South America to the New York Navy Yard to be overhauled, after which she will probably remain on the Atlantic coast, or else go to Europe. Meanwhile, it is proposed to replace her with the Chicago, which has recently returned from the European station to New York, where she will be refitted and sent to the Pacific as a flagship.

The Chicago furnishes a strong answer to many people who carp at what they term the brief lives of modern men-of-war, the people who deprecate the construction of naval ships, which, they say, too soon become obsolete. The Chicago was one of the first vessels built for the "new navy," twenty years ago. She, and the Boston, Atlanta and Dolphin, were the first vessels, built at John Roach's Yard, and the last vessels of war constructed by that eminent shipbuilder, who for many years had almost a monopoly of naval shipbuilding. Since her first commission, in 1889, the Chicago has been in almost continual service, some of it quite trying, and has proved a very serviceable vessel, although she did not take part in the Spanish-American war, during which time she was being thoroughly overhauled and refitted at the New York Navy Yard. She is nevertheless an interesting vessel with an interesting history. Provided for by Act of Congress of March third 1883, her keel was laid December twenty-ninth of the same year. She was launched December fifth, 1885. Upon her completion she was made the flagship of Rear-Admiral John G. Walker, in his famous "White Squadron," officially known as the Squadron of Evolution, with which Walker made a flying cruise abroad, exhibiting these first efforts of the United States in modern shipbuilding to the experts of Europe. For a beginning they were unquestionably good ships, although possessing many faults which were overcome in later constructions. At the time of the threatened war with Chile a dozen years ago, the Chicago was the flagship of the squadron sent to South America to make a demonstration. Her cruising since then has been in the Atlantic ocean and in European waters. She has never yet visited the Pacific. Instead of being obsolete, the Chicago is now really a more efficient vessel than she was when first placed in commission. During the remodeling that she underwent five years ago she was given an improved battery, which now consists of four eight-inch breech-loading rifles, fourteen five-inch rapid fire guns, nine six-pounders, two one-pounders and some machine guns. Furthermore, while her original speed was less than seventeen knots, new machinery and boilers now enable her to make eighteen knots. She is a comfortable vessel, and fitted up expressly for a flagship. It is expected that the Chicago will arrive on the Pacific station some time next spring or summer.

Gorman and Hanna

The whirligig of politics revolves with exceptional velocity. Up to a few weeks ago it was pretty generally conceded that Theodore Roosevelt would be nominated for the Presidency next year by the Republican party, notwithstanding the fact that many leading Republicans regarded him with disfavor. At the same time it was generally believed that William J. Bryan would dominate the next Democratic convention, and that no Democrat could be nominated without his consent. Since the elections in the East views have changed. It is now said that the results in New York, Maryland and Kentucky were a rebuke to President Roosevelt, and that the Republican victory in Ohio was evidence of Senator Hanna's strength and marked him as the man for the Republican nomination for President. After the Ohio election, Chairman Cook of the Republican state campaign said that under the leadership of President Roosevelt the Republican party had been led to an abyss, where it should stop and consider the means whereby the overthrow might be checked. He also expressed the opinion that Hanna would accept the nomination. Mr. Hanna's withdrawal from the chairmanship of the Republican national committee is now regarded as significant. So far as the Democracy is concerned, Mr. Bryan is fading away, and Arthur Pue Gorman is looming big and ominous on the political horizon. Notwithstanding Hearst's ardent espousal of the Tammany cause, the leading New York Democrats who will control the delegation from the Empire State are all talking of Gorman of Maryland for President. Mr. Gorman's political stock took a jump immediately after the signal defeat of the Republicans in Maryland. The fight there was managed by Gorman and it was at his instigation that an appeal was made to race prejudice in the gubernatorial campaign. The Democrats in Maryland are of the opinion that the race issue is a winning card for them, and they now purpose to eliminate the negro from politics altogether in that State. Moreover, they are strong enough in the Legislature to do so. It is said, too, that Gorman will insist upon raising the issue in the Democratic national convention, believing that the white votes in Indiana, Ohio, New York, New Jersey and Connecticut will far overtop any colored sentiment that President Roosevelt may have inspired. His followers interpret their victory to mean that they have a commission to complete the job of disfranchisement. Gorman's attitude will win for him many a delegation from the South, and with New York, Maryland and Missouri already booming him the indications are that he will be the most influential man in the convention. As the leader of his party in the Senate he occupies a position which gives him a decided advantage over other aspirants for Presidential honors. He is one of the shrewdest politicians in America, and is unquestionably organizing his forces to secure control of the convention.

The Greatest Living American

Meanwhile ex-President Grover Cleveland is not permitted to wander far from the stage-centre. Professional politicians are inclined to scoff at the suggestion of his availability, but there appears to be a strong popular sentiment in his favor in many sections of the country. He enjoys the respect and confidence of a large conservative element in both parties, and his admirers insist on keeping him in the public eye. They declare that recent developments have attested the wisdom of his political policy, and that the time is approaching when he will be recognized as the greatest living American. His utterances a year ago, on the future of the Democratic party, had the dignity and authority of a state paper. He then pointed out that the Democracy was thoroughly eliminating the Populist poison with which it had been inoculated at Kansas City, and the recent elections have undoubtedly shown that this purifying process has become most stringent. Cleveland contends that the future of the party depends on its return to Democratic principles, beginning with a tariff for revenue only, and in his speeches and letters of late President Roosevelt has shown a disposition to steal Cleveland thunder, for he has become an advocate of tariff reform as well as of reciprocity and Trust legislation. There are many who believe that Senator Gorman would never run for President, owing to his record as a practical politician, and who feel that he is now organizing in the interest of Cleveland. But it matters not what his chances are; the salient fact is that he is regarded throughout this country today as a great man, and one of whom the nation should be proud.

Significance of Recent Happenings

The Honorable Tom Johnson, who suffered ignominious defeat in Ohio, was the foremost exponent of Bryanism in the East. His defeat and the victory of the Republican party in Mr. Bryan's state proclaim the hopelessness of socialistic and populistic Democracy. It is worthy of reflection, on the part of all good Democrats who believe that the old-fashioned principles of their party are all that are necessary for the preservation and welfare of the Republic, that in Ohio and Nebraska, where the flubdub and demagogism of the Kansas City platform were indorsed, the party was beaten, and that in Maryland, where it returned to the patriotic and common-sense doctrines of Jefferson, it scored a signal victory. The way toward the rehabilitation of the party has been pointed, but that devoutly to be wished consummation is not likely to follow the further exploitation of Bryanism.

What Patriotism Dictates

Short-sighted Democratic editors and politicians, ever on the alert for an issue, are intent on making political capital out of the Panama situation. The unanimous verdict of European statesmen is that we are justified in assuming a friendly attitude toward the new Republic of Panama, but politicians at home are attempting to discredit the motives or impeach the conduct of our State Department. This is not a wise policy. The Administration affords an abundance of opportunity for adverse criticism in its handling of domestic affairs, and it is not only unnecessary but inadvisable to attack the President's conduct in his relations with foreign nations, in the name of national honor, merely for the purpose of gaining some political advantage. President McKinley's course with regard to the Philippines was severely denounced, and Mr. Bryan made it the principal issue in his second campaign, but it proved a boomerang. Some people are always quick to insist that their Government is wrong, but public sympathy is seldom with them. In recognizing the new-risen Commonwealth, President Roosevelt did a humane act which should be heartily commended. The people of Panama had long been victims of the same character of injustice as was inflicted on the people of Cuba, and on account of which President McKinley was urged to intervene. Yet President Roosevelt did nothing more than accept an opportunity at the hands of Destiny, and by so doing he averted violence which might have condemned the Isthmus to anarchy and slaughter. If the canal question were not involved the people who are now denouncing him would be warm in their approval. As by reason of his attitude this country is to receive great benefit, the fault-finders pretend to believe that he was actuated by selfish motives. This is not a time for impugning the honesty of the Nation's Chief. There is not a scintilla of evidence to show that he encouraged rebellion in Colombia, or that he did aught but accept the situation as it presented itself. In this connection it is worthy of note that the New York Herald, whose motives have not been challenged, has reversed its attitude of bitter opposition to the Panama canal, which for years had no parallel except in Senator Morgan's uncompromising hostility. The Herald declares that in view of recent happenings in Colombia it is now of vital importance that opposition to the Panama route should cease, and that as patriotic Americans we should support the Government, right or wrong.

A Pompous School Director

Because Mrs. Hattie B. Steele, a teacher in the School Department, had the courage to voice the sentiments of ninety per cent of her associates, in a public protest against certain absurd methods of instruction, she was summoned before the Board of Education and insulted by President Woodward. Mr. Woodward takes himself very seriously. He was indignant because Mrs. Steele sent her protest to a daily paper. He accused her of discourtesy and unprofessional conduct. The facts are that Mrs. Steele first sent her protest to the Board of Education, and that it was pocketed by Mr. Woodward, who evidently did not regard it as of sufficient importance to merit attention. He desires it to be understood that teachers have no right to make suggestions for the welfare of the department; that they should consider themselves lucky in being permitted to draw a salary. Mr. Woodward is unfit to occupy the position of school director. If he were competent there would have been no necessity for Mrs. Steele's very sensible protest. He would have known, as she does, as all the teachers in the department know, and as any intelligent person could be convinced by the mere presentation of the facts, that drawing as it is taught in some of the grades of our public schools is a ridiculous farce, and that the principal benefit derived therefrom is enjoyed by the manufacturers of material used by the children.

The Blindly Obedient

The Roman soldier who drew down his visor and held his post at the gate of Pompeii during the eruption which resulted in the destruction of that city has been resurrected as an example of perfect obedience for the youth of the day, who are exhorted to go and do likewise. It is a long while since the immortal boy who stood on the burning deck has been heard from, but likely he will have his innings again. Much as one may deplore the lack of obedience in the modern child, it must be confessed that the models which are held up for imitation do not offer much encouragement. The soldier who perished at his post because he had not sense enough to save his own life is not a particularly exalted example. Neither is the boy who stood rooted to the deck, though he knew there was no one left to give him an order to leave it. Both are specimens of the class best managed in bulk and utterly demoralized without a leader. They are the material of which mobs are made and they are the dangerous element in all commotions. Blind and unquestioning obedience to the letter of an order, by people who have reached the age of reason, is anything but a commendable quality. The Casabianca and the Roman soldier type of obedience is praiseworthy in dumb, driven cattle, but not in human beings. Neither one, had he lived till today, would ever have risen above the ranks and both were about as useful dead as alive. The chances are that neither of them would have reported the most important movement taking place under his eyes unless he had especial and minute directions concerning it. Gumption is worth something as well as obedience, and the Casabianca brand is not better than that of the witless youth in one of Grimm's stories, who carried the butter in his hat and disposed of his needle by carefully bestowing it in a bale of hay.

The Pestiferous Emasculation

How the poor children do have to suffer in these days of the "Child Study" cult. It would be interesting to know what kind of children the culturists study, where they find their specimens and how they collect enough of them to be sure they are dealing with a class and not individuals. There is such a fear that children will overwork their brains, that brains are, to all intents and purposes, removed from little heads and set away on the high shelf of the best spare room closet to be kept free from handling until the owners are big enough to be trusted with the treasures. Children's literature has been so scraped and pared and sandpapered and smoothed, lest it should present knotty points or contain references not of the A, B, C order, that one has to marvel that children care to read at all. The latest bit of vandalism in this direction is the announcement of simplified editions of "Through the Looking Glass" and "Alice in Wonderland," from which all the "puzzles" have been eliminated, lest the tender darlings should find it necessary to think a bit. Not only are children not puzzled by Lewis Carroll's books, but even the little folks too young to pick their paths through the words will often see the point of the jokes quicker than do the adults who read them. But even though they do not take in everything at first glance—suppose some of it is over their heads? What harm is there in that? What possible cause for grief is there if they are led to read the same books twice, thrice or a dozen times, and find more in them at every reading? A book that is not worth a second reading is not worth reading at all. A volume that is exhausted by a single perusal is not worth the space it takes up on the shelf of a library, and books given to children should be especially selected with a view to their permanent usefulness. It matters not a jot whether they be fairy tales, nature books or juvenile histories, as long as they are worth while. No child will ever learn to love a library book, and a book he does not want to read again might just as well belong to a public library as to his own collection. Making things easy—reducing everything to spoon-meat—has been the curse and ruin of the generation now growing up, and the novel-reading habit, second-rate novels at that, is directly traceable to the kindergarten with its nice little stories and the foolish supplementary literature forced on primary school pupils. There is great lamentation in religious circles because people no longer read the Scriptures. It was not until some wiseacre discovered that the Bible was too hard for children, and so invented the Lesson Leaves that took its place in the Sunday-schools, that the Bible was laid aside, and hence the ignorance of this day. We have had adaptations of Dickens and Scott, and even George Eliot, for children, and Bowdlerizations of the Arabian Nights and the popular fairy tales. We have animal stories in which bulls do not gore, nor goats bunt, nor dogs bite, and by them children are taught that they may pick up rattlers and scorpions if they say their prayers first. Now meddling with the Alice books has come and it is time to call a halt. It is a pity that these extremely conscientious old women of both sexes cannot be sentenced to lose the fingers of their right hands every time one of them meddles with a child's book.

Wants His Ancient Prerogative

The question of the advisability and expediency of corporal punishment as a means to an end in the public school system is under discussion in New York. The rule there, as in this city, is against corporal punishment. An unbirched generation has grown to manhood in New York since the last officially sanctioned licking was administered to an incorrigible urchin, and the principals of boys' schools have petitioned for a return to the methods of the good old days, when youngsters were held in check by the prospect of a busy session with the man with the rattan. Periodically the teachers take occasion to announce that moral suasion is a failure. They declare that there are some boys so constituted that it is utterly impossible for them to behave unless they know the teacher has authority to administer liberal doses of the rod. The principals have canvassed the schools, and out of two hundred and sixty-nine teachers only twelve say they are content with the present rule. All the others long for permission to lick a bad boy in the old-fashioned pedagogic way in which the founders of the Republic were reared. They contend that it is impossible to rule a collection of half-tamed young savages unless they are permitted to train them to a wholesome respect for law. Training, they say, implies power to enforce obedience. Meanwhile the pupils are very well satisfied with the existing rule. They have no desire to arm their ancient enemy, the schoolmaster, with what they conceive to be his favorite toy. According to their view of the case, the same that is held by parents who believe that a child's temperament should not be tampered with, it is inhuman to inflict corporal punishment.

Educating Law-Breakers

A telegraphic despatch from Baltimore last week described the attack made by "two hundred aristocratic misses" of the local high school, who accused one of their classmates of tattling, and fell upon her in the street, tearing her clothes from her, destroying her books, screaming, beating and kicking. The girl finally broke away from the mob and ran into a store where the clerks barred the doors until the police arrived and dispersed the rioters. The girls who took part in the trouble ranged from fourteen to eighteen years of age, and we are assured that this example of the effects of higher education on the female sex "took place in the most fashionable quarter of the city." Just previous to this outbreak the young ladies of Kansas City took part in one of their collegiate functions known as a "color rush." They selected the chapel as a scene for the festivities, and torn clothing, disheveled heads, black eyes and bloody noses added to the gayety of the affair, which continued close on to half an hour, despite the efforts of the faculty. Not to be outdone, our own home product at Berkeley recently inaugurated some rule about head gear, and some of the gentle sisterhood declared their intention of tearing the hats from the heads of those who, in their opinion, were not entitled to freedom of choice in millinery, and trampling them to bits. Now, has not this sort of thing gone quite far enough? Why should there be any more leniency extended in cases of this kind, when the outbreaks are on the part of school and college girls, than when they occur amongst mill operatives and pickle factory hands? There is a pretty theory that the more the State does for its citizens, the better the return in the shape of good citizenship, but facts do not bear out the theory. Our high schools and colleges appear to be institutions of higher hoodlumism as well as of higher learning, and the worst point of it is that the hoodlumism is encouraged both by the faculty and by the municipal authorities. Higher education without religion is accomplishing nothing for the State. On the contrary it is proving injurious, for it sharpens the wits of rogues, and graduates men who become crooked politicians and knavish practitioners in the various professions. There is no good reason why officers of the law should discriminate in favor of students. Many a good boy is sent to jail for some minor infraction of the law, and many a bad one is sent to college, and trained to regard the law with contempt. Some little time ago three boys scarcely past the age of infancy took a short-cut home from work by way of the Southern Pacific car track, and childlike, threw pebbles at each other in play. They were arrested and charged with train-wrecking, a capital crime under some circumstances in our State. Two years in succession the gleeful college boy has taken possession of Berkeley trains and run them at his own sweet will, and how very funny it is! Let us all laugh at the sport. When some people tamper with electric wires, with the certainty of causing damage and a fair prospect of death, there is a heavy penalty, but when the festive college boy disports himself it is so amusing. The spirit of lawlessness extends downward until now the pupils of the high schools consider themselves entitled to the same immunities and exemptions, and scarcely a week passes that we do not read of some outrage upon a fellow pupil or destruction of public property, or refusal to obey the commands of teachers. Strikes, boycotts, and lockouts are as common in educational circles as they are in the labor world, but it is to be noted that invariably the faculty give in and the young hoodlums are encouraged. It is time that some one began to discover that it does not make a particle of difference to any one whether a boy or girl gets an education or not. The loss or gain is an individual matter.

Grover Cleveland

By John P. Irish.

Mr. Cleveland is only recently seen in such perspective as to enable a just estimate of his place in history. To him has come the exquisite experience of living into a revival of his fame, and of receiving the most affectionate demonstrations of his enduring popularity. We must hunt in two directions for the reason for his emergence, from what his enemies believed was a permanent eclipse. When we search for the reason we find it in the character of the man himself, and in the sober second thought of his countrymen. When his career, beginning in municipal office in Buffalo, led him to the Presidency, through a series of events that were so rapid in movement that men were dizzied in watching them, there was much speculation about the cause of a succession of personal triumphs in public life, one following the other so closely that he was yet Mayor of Buffalo when elected Governor, and was yet Governor when elected President. After his first election and before his inauguration as President, while visiting Mr. Tilden in Yonkers, I heard this under discussion, and after listening to what many public men in the company had to say, Mr. Tilden said, "There is no mystery about Mr. Cleveland's career. The people are good judges of character, and he has the genius of leadership."

During the afflicting political events that culminated in the party disaster of 1896, and long succeeding that time, it seemed as if desertion by his party, criticism by the opposition, and every possible brutality of abuse by Mr. Bryan and the newspapers of Mr. Hearst, had made impossible the restoration of Mr. Cleveland to public confidence. But, if all others doubted that restoration, my knowledge of him and my measure of his character inspired confidence that he would resume his old place, and more: that he would stand higher in the good will of his countrymen because of the calumnies of small men that for a time injured him.

Thinking men in all parties appreciated the supreme difficulties which beset his second Administration. A panic was due. He and Mr. Manning saw signs of its coming in his first Administration; and the forces which explode and wreck prosperity and make barren the ground where it flourished were accumulating under his successor. That mechanical increment of silver in our currency was going on, and by operation of natural law was expelling gold, and the foundations were tottering, when Mr. Cleveland began his second term. If not averted, the storm could be mitigated by prompt reform of our financial legislation. To that he addressed himself with unsurpassed vigor and intelligence. His party supported him for a time, half-heartedly, then deserted him, then turned upon him with the fury of a maddened idiot, or the reasonless rage of a baboon.

We are in the habit of high ascription to the ability of Presidents who have guided the Republic through the dangers and difficulties of war. They are great, but the war President is supported by the aroused patriotism, the defensive military spirit and enthusiasm of the people. But we owe as high ascription to one who like Mr. Cleveland guides his country through such perils as those of his last Administration. Alone, without effusive public sentiment to support him, surrounded by the natural indifference of the opposition party and betrayed by his own, he saved the public credit, protected the solvency of the treasury, stopped the drain of gold, and led the way to the financial reforms which have followed, while the people for whom he wrought looked on, sullen and suspicious.

After it all, the most frightful detraction followed him into private life. His cherished household did not escape the calumnies which Mr. Bryan and his friends delighted to invent and put in motion.

Now it is all past, and the most distinguished and honored American personality in private life is Mr. Cleveland. The conscience of his countrymen has been quickened and their sense of justice aroused, so that, with the evaporation of prejudice, they are again in a mood to exercise that judgment of character which Mr. Tilden said was one of their qualities. But the character had to be in the man whom they cast down, but whom they now raise up. He and his high action are seen in perspective and may be fairly estimated.

The elements of good character are not complex. I hope to escape criticism in giving the cause of my belief in the greatness and permanence of his fame.

On the evening of the day of his election to the Governorship of New York he wrote to his brother: "I sit here in the Mayor's office alone. If mother were here, I would be writing to her, and I feel as if it were time that I wrote to some one who will believe what I write." Then followed an expression of his certainty of election: "I have been in the atmosphere of success. The thought that has troubled me is, can I well perform my duties. The question is, whether I know enough to accomplish what I desire."

There was the spirit of introspection, the self-examination, the manly doubt which generates wise caution. Then this: "Do you know, if mother were alive I should feel much safer. I have always thought that her prayers had much to do with my success." What man can read that without feeling the touch of nature that is common to us all? It was in that appeal to men, "except you become as little children," and the man who has that in his heart, undimmed by triumphs and unstained by trials, is preserving the character that is the foundation of all things. I saw him refuse an appointment to an energetic blackguard in his party who had defamed Mrs. Blaine, giving as his reason that he would "not humiliate a good woman, the mother of children." I was with him during the stormy episode of the Confederate battle flags, when a tempest of detraction raged against him. He showed me the official letter of Adjutant General Drum, recommending the return of those standards, upon which he issued the order. "But," he said, "it was contrary to law, and I have recalled the order." With some impetuosity, I said, "You will publish Drum's letter." He answered gravely, "No. It was my mistake, and I should bear the responsibility." Then a great expression came into his face as he said: "But what injustice is done by the thoughtless men who hold me up to the scorn and contempt of the country, as a man who had no sympathy with the Union and its armies! When the Civil war began there were three in our family of military age, two brothers and myself. In a family council we decided that two should enlist in the Union armies, and one stay to care for our mother and sisters, for we were poor. Mother presided over that council and we three drew cuts, the slips of paper were put in the leaves of the old Bible, held in her hands. My brothers drew to go and I to stay. When, later, I was drafted, I borrowed the money to buy a substitute, and abided by my duty, so that we furnished three fighting men. What a monster I would be were it true that I had no sympathy with the cause for which my brothers were fighting!"

There was a Homeric picture, which in its heroic simplicity will outlast all the falsehoods and pseudo-patriotism which struck at him so venomously. It carries us back to that time when the Union depended upon such family councils, and the quiet patriotism which accepted duty and faced it, even to the final sacrifice.

I think no public man has ever excelled him in intuitive judgment of men. Once I saw a company of politicians from one of our great cities present two of their number for appointment to Federal offices of importance. They were astute men, splendidly groomed, full of tact. Each had just enough of that brogue which touches language with music. They were all deep in the politics of their city. Their plea was perfect, not too much nor too little, and had I been President they would have had what they wanted. When an Irishman is corrupt in politics he is the most dangerous of all men, for his charms of manner naturalize in him the gifts and graces of all nations. The President heard them with his usual air of interest, but, as I looked at him, there appeared a purpose beneath his outward aspect, an indescribable effect, and he refused them. Within eight months every man in that group was either in jail or a fugitive from justice. Yet when they stood there no suspicion was upon them.

The charms of his address, the grace that was upon his meeting and parting with people, were never excelled. Yet he had his only training in the hard school of toil and experience, and this faculty was inherent in his character. It was merely thoughtfulness for others. I saw an old farmer go up the White House stairs with his member of Congress to be introduced. He had never met a President before, and the panic that was upon him and his hopeless loss of ease and self-possession, were painfully inscribed upon his face. But in a moment Mr. Cleveland had him at ease, and he felt as comfortable as if they were neighbors discussing the crops, and the old man acquitted himself with credit. When he came away his wrinkled face shone with the consciousness that he had shown his best to the President. To do that is a gift. It cannot be acquired, and I find its description difficult. But Mr. Cleveland put a caller at ease without seeming to try. I may say, without impropriety, that this trait is shared with Mrs. Cleveland, who is endowed with qualities as remarkable as his. At her last reception, when they were to leave the White House in 1889, the crowd was a crush and the line long. There came in view an old lady dressed plainly but neatly, leaning on a cane. She was sorely tired by the long and slow movement of the crowd. Looking down the line, Mrs. Cleveland saw her, and excusing herself to those in front, left her place, went down and took the old woman's hand in hers, greeted her and led her to a seat. It was worth an abridgment of my days to see the gratitude in that old woman's face, and to know the high worth of that example of tact and thoughtfulness.

I hope not to be misunderstood by any one. I was solicited to write these impressions, and I do not profess such consecutive intimacy with Mr. Cleveland as to imply exclusive knowledge or special opportunity to observe. It is possible that he has forgotten me, but I do not forget these incidents, amongst many that may not now be told, which were the unconscious revelations of that character which has triumphed over all misrepresentation and injustice, caused by the evil zeal of small, self-seeking men.

The man who in the hour of triumph sits alone, recalling the tender memory of his mother; who offered his life to his country by lot drawn from a Bible on her lap, and who took the great oath of President on that same, old and solemn book, consecrated by the touch of father and mother, has in him that which endears him to his countrymen, and is made of the stuff on which states must depend when peril is upon them.

I have only briefly referred to his public service. Its high value and the high manhood he brought to it are now appreciated by men. Its excellence is not exhausted in the acts which punctuate it, nor in the immediate results which have followed. His recreant party, in a debauch of demagogy, refused the opportunity he offered to it, put away the chance to earn perpetuation of its power by forgetting itself for its country. But the public credit which he saved is now safe. That which he bravely did, as an executive act, is now the law, obligatory upon all who follow him. His example is projected into our public life, and may the generation which is following know, appreciate and profit by it.

Perhaps I am not expected to speak of the party which rejected him and went daft. In 1877 Mr. Tilden told me that the Democracy would rally, elect one man to the Presidency and then pass away. He said this would be because the Southern politicians of the party had not sense enough to lead nor to follow. We shall see.

Two Men, a Picture—and a Pistol

Weldon threw down the paper impatiently, and Marston looked up with just a hint of question in his dark eyes. Weldon laughed, half apologetically.

"One gets so out of patience with botchwork," he said. "I was reading that Heterick case. If I wanted to commit suicide I'd do the job neatly—or not at all."

"Doubtless—but I'm afraid we'll have to take your word for it."

"Well, rather—especially"—and as Weldon broke off he turned, half unconsciously but wholly lovingly, to the beautiful photographed face resting on the library table before him.

Marston looked, too, and his eyes grew strange, while the drooping moustache which hid his mouth seemed suddenly to press closely down upon the rigid chin beneath. Then Weldon spoke again, half jesting, half serious:

"There is no excuse for such work as this. The man who deliberately plans suicide knows that he is preparing for his last act on earth. If he has never been careful before he should be so then. But look at Heterick! A note of explanation which leaves everything at sea—and the wretched bungle of the deed itself."

"You would do better, doubtless."

There was just a hint of sarcasm in the tone, and Weldon recognized and laughed over it in his own merry way.

"To be sure," he said. "To begin with—"

"Well?"

"I would write a good-by note short and to the point—one that even the stupidest could understand."

"Ah, yes—as for instance?"

Weldon smiled—hesitated—then laughed aloud and drew a pencil and pad toward him.

"Wait," he said.

For a moment he wrote rapidly, smiling as he did so. Then he pushed the pad across the table. Marston picked it up curiously, and read aloud:

"To Whom It May Concern: This is my own deed, for which no one is to blame but myself. There are times when even to those seemingly most fortunate life grows tiresome. "Albert Weldon."

Marston smiled faintly.

"It doesn't seem to explain much," he suggested.

"Well, no. But at least it would bar suspicion from those who might profit by my death."

"Ye—s, that is true, perhaps. And after writing—"

"After writing," said Weldon, opening his drawer with a flourish—"after writing would come—this!"

"For heaven's sake, Weldon!" said Marston, reaching forward and wresting the pistol from the other's grasp. Again Weldon's merry laugh rang out.

"Upon my word!" he said. "One would have thought you believed me in earnest."

"You were very careless," said Marston. "And the pistol is loaded, too," he added, and now beneath his dark skin appeared suddenly a strange shade of pallor.

"Yes, it is loaded," said Weldon, carelessly, "but—"

He stopped short, staring.

Marston leaned swiftly forward.

* * * * * * * * *

An instant later, with the report yet ringing in his ears, Marston was wildly summoning the household. But before he uttered his first cry he had seen to it that the pistol lay just where it might naturally have dropped from Weldon's hand. Beside it was the writing pad with the dead man's message. A red drop had somehow fallen upon it; another stained the photograph.

What May Happen

She—Don't you think these rainy-day skirts quite chic?

The Saunterer

A Social Leader Wanted

The Parrott ball, I am told, was a great surprise to many of the Burlingame set who were not invited. Since the ball it has been whispered that the Parrotts are going to organize a new haut ton to be composed of people deemed worthy of social distinction. Many expressions of dissatisfaction have been heard of late, over the alleged infusion of unfiltered blood into the social artery of the elect, and there has been discussion of the advisability of reducing the agglomeration of nobodies to a more compact and higher-toned mass. There has been a growing demand for a genuine social arbitre, a real McAllister, to wield the branding-iron of the elect. At present authority is divided, and if a climber is barred by one faction, a strategic sortie is made in another direction, and in time success is achieved. American society is composed pretty much of erstwhile climbers, but the dejection of our upper-crust is occasioned by the fact that few have had time to recover from the exertion which the climbing process involved. Mrs. Eleanor Martin has been hailed as a leader but she is said to be "easy." She is susceptible to too many pulls to make an effective dictator. There are many who believe that Mrs. Parrott is the right woman to wield the sceptre.

New Blood Necessary

While there has been considerable grumbling over the "letting down of the bars," it is the opinion of well-informed people that new people are always necessary to keep society going, especially if they have money and intend to entertain. It is the snob who wishes to be hedged behind a barbed-wire fence of exclusiveness, and who is intolerant of newcomers who happen to lack social prestige. Even the autocratic Mrs. Astor, who rules New York society, has been extremely liberal toward new aspirants for social honors. She gave a ball at Newport last season to which she invited people who had never before seen their names upon her list. There was grumbling at first but it soon subsided. The old Knickerbockers bitterly opposed the progress of the New England element in New York society fifty years ago, and there was the same opposition, after the war, to the admission of the wealthy Southerners. Then came the California siege, and later on the influx of ambitious Philadelphians, and all of those elements have been assimilated. Now the steel and iron magnates of Pittsburg are knocking at the door, and they too will be admitted. The complexion of San Francisco society has completely changed in the last quarter of a century, many people who had once been prominent having sunk into obscurity as a consequence of financial reverses, and their places being taken by new-rich who were formerly tabu in polite circles.

Renaissance of the Has-Beens

It is now believed that Mrs. Parrott does not hold the Burlingame set in high esteem, for she discriminated in favor of the old-timers and resurrected some of the Ross Valley set. So the Parrott and the De Guigne debutantes are likely to impart quite an unexpected flavor to the season's gayeties. The old set of which the Brighams, Gwins, Kittles and Allens are representative were among those invited to the ball. Mrs. Payson, the most charming and pretty of the Parrott daughters, was not present owing to ill-health. Mrs. James Follis was the belle of the evening. Some of the older men invited were General Shafter, Judge Morrow and Winfield Keyes.

Functions Galore Projected

Mrs. Parrott has inaugurated the fashion in the way of terpsichorean sedateness, but will our jeunesse doree adopt the dignified gayety of the long retired matron? The whispered tete-a-tete on the dark stairway, the shy philandering to the last measures of an alluring waltz, and the innumerable devices exploited when the blood is swift and warm, will recoil at the necessity of meeting a parent's eye across the small table, and champagne and oysters will lose half their flavor. But the fiat has gone forth; the Sutter street autocrat has established the premise, and the aspiring mother may draw her own conclusion. However, the Parrotts are going to take an active part in the winter's gayety, and the climbers will sit up and take notice. The Parrott campaign has been opened. Mrs. John Parrott gives a tea today at the Loughborough house which she has taken for the season, and cards are out for a tea at Mrs. A. M. Parrott's on Wednesday, December second. The Donahoes are going to entertain a great deal for the Parrott-De Guigne debutantes, for they are double cousins of the Parrotts, Mrs. Parrott being a sister of Mr. Donahoe and Mrs. Donahoe a sister of Mr. Parrott. The future is big with promise of dinners, dances and teas galore.

An Historical Home

The Parrott mansion in Sutter street, where the Parrott campaign was opened, is a house with a history. Back in the middle fifties it was only a little box of four rooms perched on a sandhill midway in the block in Sutter street between Powell and Mason. At that time Sutter street, west of Powell, was a deep gully of sand. The little cottage was owned and occupied by William H. Sharpe, an attorney, and his family. Later on, when the street was graded, Mr. Sharpe enlarged his home, making quite a pretentious dwelling for those days. The added portion is now the main entrance of the Parrott house of today. Senator William Sharon bought the house from Sharpe and built the spacious addition on the east side. After the failure of the Bank of California the house passed into the possession of William S. O'Brien of the bonanza firm of Flood & O'Brien, from whose heirs it was purchased by Mrs. Abby M. Parrott. The entrance of the Sharons into society was marked by a ball given in that old house in 1872, and the new addition was finished just in time for the wedding of the eldest daughter of the house—Clara Sharon—and Frank Newlands. In that house was also held the wedding reception of Mr. O'Brien's niece, Miss Cecelia Coleman, when she married Fred May of Baltimore. Since Mrs. Parrott's occupancy it has been the scene of many festivities, but owing to the death of several members f her family it has been closed for years.

Abe the Avenger

Exhilarated to the point of intoxication by his recent political triumph, Mr. Abe Ruef (A. B. of the University of California) has assumed the pose of a melodramatic avenger. This notable example of the effect of higher education in California, whom the Examiner proudly proclaims an alumnus of Berkeley, imbued with a keen sense of his great importance, is not content merely to garner the fruits of victory. To a few intimate friends he has confided his intention to strike the trail of his enemies, and stick to it until he has meted out the punishment they deserve. He has resolved to make them feel that his disfavor is not to be recklessly incurred. The virulence of his distemper is to be directed principally against Franklin K. Lane, who had the temerity in the late campaign to say some unkind things about the Labor Party boss. Mr. Lane was in a slanderous mood when running for Mayor, and he announced that everybody was a crook who didn't believe in him, but in the case of Mr. Ruef he grew specific, and consequently Abe is thirsting for revenge. The proud and haughty boss has announced his intention to drive Lane into the Poor House.

Other Prospective Victims

Boss Ruef also intends to devote a little of his time t Mr. M. H. De Young of the Chronicle. He does not contemplate compassing the financial ruin of Mr. De Young, but he has decided to prevent the Chronicle's proprietor from becoming a delegate to the Republican National Convention. Mr. Crothers of the Bulletin is to have the circulation of his paper greatly reduced by way of revenge, and certain corporations are to be sadly crippled by legislation at Sacramento, for Abe really thinks that he is going to secure control of the next Legislature. So look out for Abe the Avenger. He is on the war-path with blood in his eye, and he is looking for scalps. He considers himself dangerous, and I really think he is, but principally to himself.

The Debut of Livernash

At the opening of Congress, Mr. E. J. Livernash, of the Fourth District, was caught red-handed in the practice of duplicity. He was granted the floor to speak to a question of personal privilege, and then he proceeded to attack the Administration, but was promptly called down. As Mr. Livernash is not yet sure of his seat in Congress, he exercised very bad judgment on his first appearance. There is a very strong prejudice in Washington against embryonic statesmen who have a predilection for the tactics of the police court shyster. In view of the beginning that Mr. Livernash made, I should not be surprised if Congress were inclined to resolve all doubts in the contest of Kahn vs. Livernash, in favor of the petitioner.

An Economical Host

Not long ago at a private ball where refreshments were served in the large supper room, a la buffet, the young men had been serving their partners and were about to help themselves to the oyster poulette. One young man dished out a generous plateful when the host, who was looking over his shoulder, said, "Four apiece, gentlemen, four apiece," to the consternation of the young man.

He's Earning a Big Fee

Dr. J. Wilson Shiels is now engaged in earning the biggest fee of his professional career. He has been selected to travel East with the daughter-in-law of Senator Clark, the Montana copper king. Mrs. Clark is suffering from a kidney complaint, and there is scarcely any hope of her recovery. Dr. Shiels will certainly be richly compensated for his services, for he will lose his practice in San Francisco while in the East with his distinguished patient. Besides, medical men usually take into consideration the prominence of a patient, for they feel that the death of a conspicuous person is a great blow to their reputation owing to the publicity it receives. Senator Clark, for all his money, has had extraordinarily bad luck with his daughters-in-law. His other daughter-in-law died under most painful circumstances about a year ago, and now it is said that all the money in Montana cannot save the life of Dr. Shiels's patient.

This trip East prevented Dr. Shiels from taking his part in the private theatricals last Saturday night, but the part was quite acceptably filled by his understudy. Mrs. Shiels, though it was her first appearance in public, literally covered herself with glory. She is very pretty, with red hair and a lovely skin.

Mrs. McAllister Originated Them

Sunday teas, which were so gravely frowned upon when the Joliffe girls, Miss Ellinwood and Mrs. Burns Macdonald revived the custom, are now no longer regarded as an impropriety. Long before society took them up, the ultra-Bohemians like Mrs. Carmichael-Carr used to give Sunday afternoon at homes. It was Mrs. Hall McAllister, though, who gave the first Sunday teas in San Francisco fully thirty-five years ago. But in those days it was an evening instead of an afternoon function. Mrs. McAllister was at that time the soprano of the choir of the Church of the Advent, whose rector was her brother-in-law, the Reverend Marion McAllister. As she always had a number of very attractive young ladies staying with her, she began by saying to some of the young men of her acquaintance: "Be at church tonight and then you can come round to my house afterwards for a cup of tea." Sunday evenings at that time were dull and dreary in the extreme to the average bachelor, so her invitations were eagerly accepted. The fame of these evenings spread abroad. They were simple and informal, but very pleasant, and it soon became an understood thing with Mrs. McAllister's friends that on Sunday evening they should go to her home for a cup of tea. Mrs. McAllister was one of the most fascinating women of her time, and it is upon record that on one occasion Bishop Kip graced her Sunday tea.

Let's Hope It's Not True

The friends of Bob Aitken are much disturbed at the report that he is going to give up sculpture and take to the stage. Though Aitken has lots of dramatic talent, as has been shown at Bohemian Club jinks, it would be a serious loss to art were he to be lured by the footlights' glare. There is always a plethora of actors but gifted sculptors are rare. Considering his years he has attained wonderful success, and therefore it is surprising that he should be thinking of entering the theatrical profession. But one never knows what to expect of the artistic temperament.

Two "Britishers" from California

When Denis O'Sullivan started for London, a short time ago, it was thought that he was going over to engage in concert work again, but an occasional correspondent writes me that he has made a big hit in the latest musical comedy success of the British metropolis. "He is playing," writes my correspondent, "Sergeant Lefebvre in 'The Duchess of Dantzic,' which is said to be the best musical piece that has been seen in London for years. It is one of the productions of George Edwardes who produced 'The Gaiety Girl' and 'The Country Girl,' and the papers are extravagant in their praise of what they declare to be the finest English company that has been rounded up for years. What was my surprise to find two of the leading roles in this 'English company' played by two old San Francisco friends—Denis O'Sullivan and Holbrook Blinn. Henry Hamilton wrote the book and the lyrics, and the score is by Ivan Caryll, who you will probably remember composed 'La Cigale' which we heard at the Baldwin when Lillian Russell was here. The book is indebted to Sardou's 'Madame Sans-Gene' for the main lines of the story. Blinn is the Napoleon of the cast, and his is really a great impersonation."

Passing of the Special Writer

The special writer for the Sunday supp. has passed out of San Francisco journalism, and with him has passed a very ladylike school of journalists and an opportunity for good work. Some remarkably clever people were developed through the special story for the Sunday supp., for the work demanded more imagination and more fineness of touch than the hack work of the ordinary reporter. The Chronicle retained the home flavor and encouraged the local literary genius until recently, but I believe that brakes were put on and now it looks just like the New York World and is filled from cover to cover with syndicated pages. Of course it makes the supplement much less worth reading, for the sensational trash syndicated by the page has no value and is usually not true, but it is much cheaper and that is what the papers are after. These syndicated supplements mean the passing of the Sunday editor. There is a far cry from Cosey Noble, who edited the Sunday Examiner when it had a local flavor, to the make-up man who gets out the Sunday newspaper now. With the removal of all necessity for editorial brains and judgment there is no reason at all why the foreman of the composing room should not be the Sunday editor.

Miss Bessie Mills will be one of the youngest graduates that ever took a degree at Berkeley. At Christmas she will have finished the entire course in three years. The Mills family, by the way, are thinking of selling their home here before they go abroad.

Is Thawing Out

The Pacific-Union Club is losing its reputation for exclusiveness because it has been obliged to admit many new members to raise money to defray the cost of its new building. The Pacific-Unioners have so great a horror of publicity that editors are not considered eligible for membership, although Mr. Hearst and John D. Spreckels belong to the club. The latter, however, was admitted before he became the proprietor of the Call.

Mrs. Poett's Presents

When Miss Carolan wedded Harry Poett it gave her world a deal of satisfaction. It would have been such a calamitous thing, you see, had a Carolan wedded outside of her set. Her friends were saved tears of chagrin, therefore, when she married a Poett. The bride, by the way, received beautiful presents. There was quite a lot of silverware from her sister-in-law, Mrs. Frank Carolan, and her friends' gifts included antique furniture, jewelry and all sorts of expensive things.

Wearied of the Fashionable Whirl

Handsome Helen Dean who left for New York this week is not to feast of the delights of Gotham's gay winter, but is going in for serious work. She will spend the winter receiving instruction from voice, violin and piano teachers. Miss Dean is very musical and she expresses herself as heartily sick of society with its endless teas, luncheons and dinners. She says she did nothing last winter but eat, dance and call, and one winter was enough of it for her. This girl was a real social success and she will be thoroughly missed. In April the Deans go to Europe, where their stay will be indefinite.

One of the Eligibles

Mr. Balfour, one of the latest of the bachelors taken up by society, is to leave for England in a few weeks to be gone for some time. He is a clever chap and quite popular. Many people have made a fuss over him thinking that he was the Mr. Balfour, but he always takes pains to explain that he is no relation to the head of the firm.

Too Cheap for Them

The exhibition and sale of pictures at the Palace last week was not a success for the reason that the managers of it, in their anxiety to make money, over-reached themselves. They announced that the pictures of Keith, Mathews and McComas would be sold for fifteen and twenty dollars each, and when those artists read the circulars they withdrew their work from the exhibition.

Mr. and Mrs. James S. Angus have returned from Europe. They made a very long stay abroad, chiefly in London and Italy.

Greenway's Object Lesson

Ned Greenway is not one of our wealthy bachelors, but he occasionally gives some of our plutocrats an object lesson in hospitality. His last birthday dinner was the most elaborate and expensive one ever given by a bachelor to his friends in this city. I hear that it did not cost less than a thousand dollars. Mr. James D. Phelan gives a great many dinners, but usually for the purpose of lionizing somebody, and the guests are always of a limited number. But it is not through economical motives that Mr. Phelan refrains from dispensing hospitality on an elaborate scale. He is afraid of being suspected of ostentatious display.

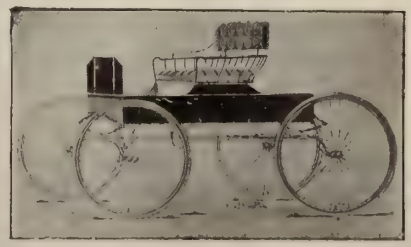
Off to the Parisian Footlights

From reliable authority I learn that Grace Llewellyn Jones has been so greatly encouraged by her success as "Phedre" in Berkeley that she has decided to become an actress. She will leave for Paris in about two months, and she will study for the French stage at the Theatre Francaise. Though she does not possess great histrionic ability, she is graceful in appearance and action and is bubbling over with temperament. Her French is so good that none but a native could detect a foreign accent. She is a prominent member of the Browning Club and also of the new Polyglot Club. Her home in Franklin street is a gathering place for the most cultured people in the city.



Another Double of Mrs. "Pat"

Not satisfied with questioning the superiority of our climate, Los Angeles denies that there is any woman in San Francisco who bears so close a resemblance to Mrs. "Pat" Campbell as does Miss Cora Linsay Skinner, dramatic critic of the Times. A correspondent writes me that Miss Skinner has the "Italian look and coloring of Mrs. Pat, and the same hair and expression," and incidentally informs me that she is as pleasant as she is pretty. To my correspondent I am indebted for the additional information that she knew Mrs. Campbell when both belonged to an amateur dramatic club in London, and that in those days Mrs. "Pat" supported herself by giving music lessons. She obtained her first professional engagement on the strength of her work as Suzanne in Sardou's "A Scrap of Paper," presented by the club. Miss Skinner, by the way, is the young woman who introduced little Edna Darch of Los Angeles to Calve. The child was adopted by the singer, and she has returned to Los Angeles as the ward of the French woman who carries on all business correspondence through Miss Skinner.

A Generous Bachelor Maid

Miss Dillon has sent the social ball rolling along the floors of her beautiful new home. Already she has commenced giving a number of small teas, "just informal gatherings for the girls," and her invitations are accepted eagerly, for one is sure of being allowed a deep breath in the presence of this unaffected bachelor maid. Miss Dillon, notwithstanding her claims to heiress-ship, has managed to remain unspoiled, and is not one whit deceived by the amorous cooing which always accompanies the jingling of the guinea. By the way, she is the most generous heiress in San Francisco, and now that the Christmas season is approaching some people are curious to know what she is going to present to her friends. Miss Dillon has æons of money and when she likes a girl she gives her a diamond ring, and if she likes her a good deal she gives her a house and lot or a bunch of flats to rent. One year she presented most of her relatives with flats to increase their rent-roll, much to the delight of those worthy people.

The Charming Card Party

Mrs. Thomas Kirkpatrick was hostess at one of the most delightful card parties of the season last Thursday afternoon. Euchre was the game played at the five tables. The house was artistically decorated with roses, chrysanthemums and autumn foliage, and the brightly lighted rooms were in comforting contrast to the gloomy, drizzling weather without. There were handsome prizes for the fortunate winners and after they were awarded luncheon was served in the spacious dining-room. Covers were laid for twenty-two, the pink color scheme carried out in hanging baskets of carnations and roses, gracefully entwined with maiden-hair and asparagus fern. The guests were Mrs. George Clark, Mrs. G. Dow, Mrs. J. A. Doyle, Miss Doyle, Mrs. C. Evans, Mrs. J. Firth, Mrs. C. Hellwig, Mrs. B. Kron, Mrs. L. T. Jones, Mrs. F. M. Munger, Mrs. C. Goodall, Mrs. C. Gerrish, Mrs. T. O'Brien, Mrs. A. Seaman, Mrs. Stadmuller, Mrs. B. Lutz, Mrs. S. Hendy, Mrs. Morffew, Mrs. J. Spalding, Mrs. D. Walker, Mrs. McCulloch, Mrs. F. Gates.

The Stork Again

The stork is hovering over the home of Frank Powers, the attorney, and the sign, "Boy Wanted," is conspicuously displayed, for the two Powers children, aged ten and two, are both girls. Frank Powers, by the way, is coining money, both professionally, through his connection with the Hellers and Hellmans, and through his booming of a large piece of country real estate which he has acquired in Santa Barbara county. He is a natural-born boomer.

Another stork item comes to me from the East. The tall white bird, says an intimate friend of Mrs. Willie K. Vanderbilt Jr. (our own Virgie Fair), is about to bear another olive branch to the home of the young millionaire and his affectionate wife.

They're Writing a Book

Miss Emily Rosenstirn and Mr. Sidney Josephs are collaborating on a book which will soon be in the hands of a publisher. Miss Rosenstirn is the unconventional young woman who achieved considerable newspaperiety some time ago by giving an "appendicitis dinner" to all her appendixless friends, with skulls, crossbones and other ghastly things for decorations. She is a young woman of brilliant intellect, and her friends are confident that she is destined to achieve things worth while. Mr. Josephs has won some local fame as a caricaturist.

The Anti-Ball Crusade

Despite all that is being said in deprecation of the course of drawing in the public schools, Miss Katherine Ball, the lady by whom it was dictated, maintains a most dignified silence. She probably feels that she need have nothing to say unless she is called upon by the Board of Education to defend her system. So the teachers who have been nursing a grievance for years, and who are giving vent to their pent-up feelings, are somewhat chagrined at their failure to start a genuine controversy. They have made it evident, however, that our school system is poorly regulated. There must be laxity of supervision if children are required to waste their time in attempting the obviously impossible. Any one who has had practical experience with children knows that at six or seven years their clumsy little fingers have but an uncertain hold on pen or pencil, and that with the best of intentions on their part their efforts in draftsmanship require interpretation. Their drawings are as crude and vaguely symbolic as the hieroglyphics of primitive nations, yet under Miss Ball's method they are commanded to draw from nature and to produce landscapes in tones of green or brown or red. Moreover they are furnished with crude colored crayons, sold at the rate of seven for a nickel, the box containing but one sample of each color, and yet Miss Ball, it is said, condemns their drawings on account of their "lack of luminosity." And what is worse, in the opinion of the overworked class teachers, she reports them for incompetency when the work of their pupils fails to meet her approval. According to their story she rules them with the severity of a martinet, and hence their indignation.

Engraved Wedding Announcements and Invitations

ROBERTSON, 126 Post Street San Francisco

An Earnest Defender

Though Miss Ball has not seen fit to "rush into print" in her own defense, she has friends among the club-women of the city who very ardently espouse her cause. I have received a communication from one of them in which she avers that from all that has been said against Miss Ball it appears that her only fault is that she is too strenuous, and she adds that it is a rare fault in our school department. From the same source I learn that the subject of the course in drawing was discussed at a principals' meeting last week, and that while a majority of the principals requested a reduction of work, some of the most prominent supported Miss Ball. Mr. W. W. Stone, of the James Lick school, who, it is said, is engaged to Mrs. Steele, the author of the communication that started the whole row, argued against the drawing teacher, and my informant declares that his remarks were of such a nature as to justify an investigation of the James Lick school.

Discussed by Principals

Continuing, my correspondent says: "This whole agitation is the result of discontent over the introduction of new methods in language, arithmetic and geography. It is a sort of school ma'am paroxysm of mental indigestion due to over-feeding on new ideas. Miss Ball is always a good target for the wrath of the teachers, for they dislike drawing because it is difficult to teach, is easily inspected and is always a record of the actual class-room work and the teacher's methods." Miss Ball attended the meeting of principals, and in a most diplomatic manner said she was sorry that her course, which she had so carefully planned, had caused so much trouble. She suggested that there might be ways of adjusting things without a rebellion, and that she would like to please the teachers.

Growth of an Alarming Passion

Somewhere in one of his discourses Spencer claims that what is common to all is, as civilization advances, deliberately hidden by the few. The striking and recent verification of cold-blooded science, on the occasion of our last international marriage, makes the unbiased American sit up and think. When the female population of a great city rushes headlong to where the angels of delicacy are treading lightly; when womanly dignity is vanquished by curiosity—the most vulgarizing of attributes—to the complete loss of decency; when the law deals corporal punishment to silk-clad women; then it is that the universal trait shows itself in all its ugly primitive brutality. The love germ for a coronet is securely concealed in the homespun as well as in the transferred money bags, and it only requires the occasion for contagion to become infection, and the presence of a live duke to transform gentlewomen into harpies. Surely democracy is developing an alarming passion for the moth-eaten glories of aristocracy! We call ourselves free, and yet women in the highest places bend the neck under the once rejected yoke of serfdom.

Booming Debutantes

The business of booming debutantes has become a well-established one and now every well-regulated girl has her press agent. This industry was first started when Miss Pearl Landers commenced her meteoric flight through society. Miss Landers is not noted for her pulchritude though she is a bright, pleasant, lively girl. There is nothing unusual about her but for six months there were not more than three mornings that Miss Landers's face might not be seen wrapping up the meat coming from the butcher's, or smiling from some other package. Of course it wasn't her fault. Every daily kept her picture in stock and threw it in on all possible occasions. She was boomed both in and out of season, not at her instigation, but it made her social success. Now it is considered the proper thing to be boomed and the girls who have come out this season are being put through a social sweating process. While their photographs are not so much in evidence there is not a day that certain social columns of certain dailies do not contain some reference to these young girls, whose heads are quite turned since they imagine they are the "whole thing" in society It is very amusing. In one case, money is said to have passed to accomplish this end and in another case a little judicious entertaining did the business. Meanwhile, far more genial and popular girls are not even mentioned. It's the way things go in this world.

Missed the Luncheon

There were three vacant places at Mrs. Henry Dutton's luncheon at the University Club last week. Peculiar accidents prevented three of the guests from appearing and Mrs. Dutton was left in ignorance of the cause of their non-appearance till late in the afternoon. It seems Miss Dillon and her bosom friend, Miss Cosgrave, went for an automobile ride in the morning, expecting to be back in time. But autos are not to be depended on and this one broke down some miles from any car line, and after spending an hour trying to mend their machine Miss Dillon and Miss Cosgrave started on foot for home. Needless to say they did not attend the luncheon. The third absentee was Mrs. Hilda MacDonald Baxter. She spent the entire day laboring under the delusion that her luncheon engagement was for Friday instead of Thursday. About six o'clock one of her friends telephoned to inquire if she were ill. She had been missed at the luncheon, and it wasn't until inquiry was made over the 'phone that the truth was learned.

Margaret and Henry

Though the theatrical season is well advanced in New York, Margaret Anglin has not yet reached Broadway. This will no doubt surprise her society friends in San Francisco who imagine that she is the brightest star in the Frohman galaxy. Louis Nethersole, who managed Mr. Miller and Miss Anglin on their latest Western trip, is responsible for the astounding news, in a letter to a friend, that they have been playing a stock season in Milwaukee. Moreover, he is responsible for the doleful news that Miss Anglin is disgusted with the way she has been treated in America and that she is going to London to settle down in the English capital as an English actress. He thinks that her genius has been obscured by managerial unwisdom. And yet we have been told that she was a Frohman pet, and last year when she scored here in "Camille" it was reported that the magnate of the Syndicate intended to revive the play for her in New York. Is it possible that he did not have sufficient confidence in her?

She'll Star Herself

On the heels of Nethersole's letter comes a press despatch to the effect that Margaret Anglin had obtained the rights to "Cynthia," the play written by Hubert Henry Davies, formerly of this city, for Elsie de Wolfe who appeared in it last season. She is expected to make a Broadway production of it, but it remains to be seen whether she has changed her mind in the matter of a London debut. I seriously doubt that she will risk comparison with Elsie de Wolfe on Broadway. The latter is one of the most popular actresses in New York, and has long been a full-fledged star, whereas Margaret Anglin has never been anything but a stock actress in New York, and a star in San Francisco. Here is where she is best appreciated. We had Margaret and Henry as the great twin stars of the theatrical firmament. Our provincial smart set raves over them and our critics go into ecstasies over their genius. To be unmoved at a Miller-Anglin performance at the Columbia is to confess oneself incapable of appreciating the very soul of dramatic art. Our admiration for them is in a measure an expression of our gratitude which they have earned by regaling us annually with the latest theatrical tidbits.

A Split in a Woman's Club

San Jose social circles are considerably agitated over the rupture which has taken place in the Young Ladies' auxiliary of the San Jose Woman's Club. The auxiliary was organized last August and it became a stepping-stone to membership in the adult circle. For a time all went smoothly, but many of the young ladies are of a very progressive turn of mind, and desire to have their own say about things, instead of being subjected to dictation from the older members. Matters finally reached a climax and there was a wholesale secession of the brightest and most charming young women of the auxiliary. The secessionists formed a club of their own, calling it "La Jeunesse Doree." They organized on a broader and more liberal plan and instead of bi-weekly discussions on economical, ethical and philosophical topics they have introduced social features. La Jeunesse Doree has been making great inroads into the membership of the auxiliary and the protegees of Mrs. W. C. Kennedy, president, Mrs. Dr. Stocking, Mrs. E. O. Smith and other members of the Woman's Club are not a little chagrined at the apparent success of the secessionists. Mrs. Lillian Crothers, president, Miss Della Beach, vice-president, Miss Emma Orvis and Miss Delmas Walter are among the more progressive members of La Jeunesse Doree. Some of the leading members of the auxiliary of the Woman's Club are Miss Genevieve Chambers, president, Miss Ella Brady, vice-president, Miss Marguerite Dinsmore, Mrs. Maud Bailey, Miss Ruby Brooks and Miss May Morton. Rivalry between the two organizations is at white heat and each is attempting to outdo the other in every department of work taken up.

Politics in San Jose

The people of Santa Clara county are watching the affairs of the Union League Club, a new political organization, with much interest. It was organized a few months ago and has been quietly adding members since its inception. The people have had their curiosity aroused by the fact that prominent among the members of the club are many of the leaders of the two political factions in the garden city—the gang and anti-gang. These forces have been bitterly antagonistic during the past two or three campaigns. The Hayes brothers, Dr. Dow, Professor Childs and many others prominent in political reform circles, sit side by side in conference with Dr. M. A. Southworth, Allan Brant, Dr. Kelley and many others who have in the past been closely identified with the McKenzie faction. The semblance of harmony has given rise to all sorts of conjectures. Some have it that the organization has been started to effect harmony in the Republican party, and others contend that behind the movement is a scheme on the part of a few men to get control of the machine.

Folsom Management Scored

Superior Judge Lieb of San Jose doesn't mind if the whole State knows what he thinks about the management of the penitentiary at Folsom. In pronouncing sentence on a bicycle thief, the other day, he said: "I shall send no one to Folsom until there has been a change in the management of the prison. I feel that no person sent there is satisfactorily incarcerated. It is too easy to get out."

last week at an amateur minstrel performance given at Antioch, the country home of the Belshaws. The Ladies Club there gave a two-night entertainment of which quite the piquant feature was Mrs. Belshaw in a stunning and most becoming gown of red, with large white picture hat, seated with a bevy of dusky maidens and acting as interlocutor. Mrs. Belshaw is so thoroughly the grande dame at Antioch and is so entirely the correct and stately society lady, that her appearance in minstrelsy even among friends in itself lent piquancy and charm to the doings, and for once "Charlie," who is quite a parlor comedian, wasn't IT a bit. He sang "It Was the Dutch" and did several other turns, but when it came to passing the bouquets after the show, Senator Belshaw was a two-spot beside his wife.The Belshaws spend most of their time at the Jackson street home in town, going frequently to Antioch where they have large interests.

The Martyred President's Widow

Mrs. James A. Garfield is expected to arrive in Southern California in a few days and will pass the winter in her home in Pasadena. She is usually accompanied by her daughter and lives very quietly, seeing few people. She avoids all publicity and it is impossible for a newspaper man to gain an audience with her. She simply will not talk either of the past or the present for publication. She is a dignified old lady and looks very motherly and charming in her white lace cap and bertha crossed on her bosom.

A Gay Adventuress

The Baroness Blanc, who cut a swath among local club men some years ago, when she had an engagement at the old Bush street theatre, is again figuring in a scandal in the East. She obtained a large sum of money from a gullible individual, who loaned it to her on the security of a key, which was supposed to fit a box containing a large amount of ready cash, but which proved to be empty. The "Baroness" has long been a very successful adventuress. She has lately been doing stunts in vaudeville houses and is in demand in the East when racy entertainments are given in the clubs. She has had nearly as many husbands as she has fingers. One of them was Shirley Onderdonk, a Chicago man of excellent family, who a decade ago was a cotillion leader and a great beau in Chicago society.

The Passing of Syle

Many causes contributed to the death, preceded by the mental collapse, of Professor L. Du Pont Syle. It is said he never seemed to regain his poise, mentally or bodily, after he left the University presided over by Benjamin Ide Wheeler. Probably he would still be pursuing his even, honorable way at the Berkeley college had he refrained from writing an unsuccessful play. It is said that President Wheeler can pardon any fault but failure. Had Syle's adaptation of "Francillon" proved a triumph, the playwriting professor would likely never have become persona non grata to President Wheeler. But the play which was adapted for Katherine Kidder made neither fame nor fortune for its author, and on the heels of this unkind stroke of fate came all his other misfortunes. Syle, say his friends, should have been satisfied to teach French and the classics, and impart his knowledge to immature mentalities. But he chose to write learnedly and ponderously of modern dramas and mummers, in his capacity of dramatic critic for the Call, and that proved his ruin, for it impelled him to play-writing.

Worthing's Jolt

Syle's most intimate friends blamed Benjamin Ide Wheeler for his downfall. They say that he incurred Wheeler's displeasure by his independence, and that after he severed his connection with the University Wheeler pursued him relentlessly. When Syle was a dramatic critic his criticisms aroused the antipathy of the theatrical profession. He disapproved of Frank Worthing's work in "The Only Way," and the actor took occasion to jolt the critic one day when they met in the Bohemian Club. Worthing feined to be unaware of Syle's presence. He began to talk about dramatic critics and turned the conversation upon the Berkeley professor.

"He is a pedant," said Worthing, "who thinks that his familiarity with ancient drama qualifies him to pass judgment upon exponents of the histrionic art."

Syle refrained from entering into an argument.

To Enlighten the Oracles

For the benefit of my confused contemporaries, I would state that Miss Mary Harrington is to be married next week to Lieutenant-Commander Albert Parker Niblack, U. S. Navy, and that the ceremony is to be performed by Chaplain Adam Armstrong McAlister, of the same service. I have been as greatly amused as the participants and their friends have been annoyed by the floundering of the press social oracles over the spelling of the names of the two men. They have had it Niblach, Niblache, Niblacke and I do not know how many other ways. The worthy chaplain, who, by the way, was for a long time chaplain at Annapolis and afterwards Sampson's chaplain on the flagship New York during the Spanish war, has been called McAllister, McAlester, and other things. It will be some time yet before Niblack is a commander.

Life Is Too Strenuous for Them

I learn with surprise and regret that Rear-Admiral Robley D. Evans—our "Fighting Bob"—is breaking in health out on the Asiatic station, which he commands. The extent to which ill-health is assailing our naval officers, both young and old, is becoming a serious matter, and can only be attributed to the shortage of officers which requires long and arduous service in the tropics, with reliefs few, and responsibilities great in peculiarly trying climates. Our Navy is suffering from both paucity of officers and the lack of experience in the youths now occupying the grades from lieutenant down.

Our Historical Flagship

The recently created Rear-Admiral, French E. Chadwick, has just hoisted his flag upon the oldest vessel in the Navy in commission, the ancient sailing frigate Constellation, which has been made the flagship at the Narragansett Bay training station. The Constellation was built shortly after the war of the Revolution, and saw her first active service under old Commodore Truxtun, ancestor of Truxtun Beale and "Billy" Truxtun of the Navy, in the short and peculiar war with France during the last decade of the eighteenth century, when she captured one French frigate and crippled another. The old vessel has been serially overhauled since those gallant days of carronades and boarding pikes, until little of the old hull save the topsail-sheet bitts and a few pieces of keelson are left, but she preserves the graceful lines that made her as splendid a sailer in the old times as she was a score of years ago, when she was used as a practice-ship at Annapolis.

Rash Usher

There is a pretty little story, which has never yet appeared in print, about Lieutenant-Commander N. R. Usher, who has just been relieved from duty at the Naval War College and assigned to the General Board of the Navy. It is characteristic of the man. Usher had command of the Ericsson, the second of our modern torpedo-boats, before and during the Spanish war, and was an enthusiast over her possibilities. When Cervera's fleet was located, Usher was wild to test his little boat, and, summoning his men together, informed them that he thought the Ericsson had some chance of sinking one of the Spaniards if allowed to go after them, single-handed, into the harbor of Santiago, but impressed the men with the fact that there was slim chance of the torpedo-boat or any of those on her surviving. "Are you with me, men?" he asked, when he got through. "YES, SIR!" came immediately from every throat. Usher thereupon went to Admiral Sampson and implored him to permit the attempt. Sampson positively refused the request, which was almost on bended knees, and Usher's heart was broken for the rest of the war because he and his men were not allowed to commit suicide in the slim hope of hurting the enemy. His anguish was worse when Hobson's bungling exploit was allowed.

Gallant McCalla

The recent promotion of Bowman H. McCalla to the grade of Rear-Admiral meets with the approval of all who appreciate merit. If any one has earned this rank, the highest in the normal run of the service, McCalla certainly has. He is admittedly a hard man to sail under, for he keeps every one on the jump, and is exacting in the extreme, but he accomplishes things. If some of the croaking critics who have "knocked" him for his brutality on the Enterprise a dozen years ago, or for his joyous little lark in Bermuda during the same cruise, had a tenth of McCalla's efficiency, they would find some better use for their time and their tongues than for envious attacks upon one of the best officers in the service. He was hard on his officers and men of the Marblehead during the Spanish war, but he was still harder on the enemy in consequence of his and their activity, and I have not heard one of his old shipmates, either from forward or aft, of that cruise, who was not glad he had served under McCalla on the "fightin'est ship of the fleet," as the jackies under Sampson called her. The new admiral's record in the Chinese expedition is too recent to need the praise that is its due.

Personal Comfort Provided For

The new cruiser Tacoma, which is to go into commission at an early date under the command of popular Commander "Reggie" Nicholson, will be the second of her class to be commissioned, the Cleveland having been put in service under the command of Commander C. E. Colahan on the second instant, at Portsmouth, N. H. I understand that the vessels of this class are sought after by the officers who are fond of personal comfort, as they have exceptionally commodious quarters, their speed having been considerably sacrificed to yield to the cry for "more room."

The Hero in Bohemia

Not long ago President Phelan of the Bohemian Club had General Miles in tow, and, as he entered the dining-room with the soldier, he whispered hurriedly to one of the members who sat near the door, "Start three cheers for General Miles," whereupon the member, not at all impressed by gold buttons, said quite audibly, "To hell with Miles."

Invitations have been issued to a favored few in San Francisco to the wedding of Miss Maria Louisa Miller, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Samuel W. Miller Peters, and Lieutenant David Harmony Biddle, Sixth Cavalry, U. S. A. The marriage will take place at high noon on Tuesday, December first, in the Church of the Ascension, Philadelphia.

Misses the Brass Buttons

Since the departure of the popular Seventh regiment several of our society girls have been feeling quite lonesome. Out in Green street lives a girl who was made disconsolate by the departure of Lieutenant Ben Tillman. She is one of last winter's debutantes. Tillman, by the way, is a brother of Lieutenant-Governor Tillman of North Carolina who murdered editor Gonzales.

"What is Scooper doing now? Is he on a daily, a weekly, or a monthly?"

"On a periodical, the last time I saw him. Came to in the bug-ward three days later, I believe."

It Lacks Verisimilitude

The only improbable feature of the story about the deal made by Whittell pere to secure the freedom of his precious son from a contract marriage, is the purchase price. Mr. Whittell is such a worthy son-in-law of that late unlamented, soulless miser, Nick Luning, that it is highly incredible that he would be so extravagant as to part with twenty-five thousand dollars when the end desired could have been accomplished at far less expense. Though Mr. Whittell endured no handicap, or anxiety, or mental or physical strain in achieving his wealth, he is as cautious in the handling of it as though he spent a life-time in accumulating it. He could not be a more prudent manager if he were under direct restraint from old Nick, the founder of the fortune.

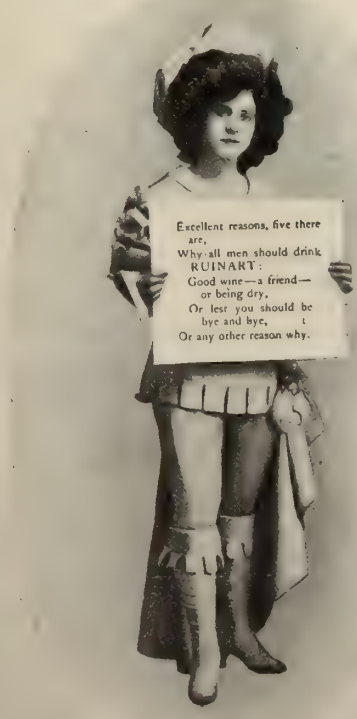
It Doesn't Mean an Estrangement

It has been pretty well understood in social circles that Pearl Landers and young Whittell were betrothed, and that the announcement would be made as soon as the millionaire's son had emerged from the shadow of his past. It is consequently unfortunate that a scandal grew out of the annulment of the marriage, for no young girl cares to have the past of her fiance ventilated. There was a time in the good old Puritan days when such a scandal would have ruptured an engagement, but pasts no longer have any terror for a society girl. In his novel, "The Mettle of the Pasture," James Lane Allen separates his hero and heroine because of the former's confession that he was not as pure as the beautiful snow. The episode causes most young people to shriek with laughter.

"Tom Gay says he passes his whole life pursuing virtue."
"Never heard of his catching up, did you?"



He Was Not Indicted

In my paragraph of last week concerning the appointment of Frank Heney as special counsel for the prosecution of the Oregon land fraud cases, I inadvertently referred to attorney C. A. S. Frost as one of the men indicted in connection with the litigation over certain Nome mining claims. Mr. Frost was found guilty of contempt of court but his alleged offense involved no moral turpitude.

The Coming of Yeats

Mr. W. B. Yeats, the Irish dramatist and poet, who is said to be coming to this city, is a very interesting character. Readers of Stevenson may remember this letter, which the novelist wrote to the young Irishman just before his death:

"Vailima, Samoa, April 14, 1894.

"Dear Sir,

"Long since, when I was a boy, I remember the emotions with which I repeated Swinburne's poems and ballads. Some ten years ago a similar spell was cast upon me by Meredith's 'Love in the Valley': the stanzas beginning 'When her mother tends her' haunted me and made me drunk like wine; and I remember waking with them the echoes of the hills about Hyeres. It may interest you to know that I have a third time fallen in slavery: this is to your poem called 'The Lake Isle of Innisfrae.' It is so quaint and airy, simple, artful and eloquent to the heart—but I seek words in vain. Enough that 'always night and day I hear lake water lapping with low sounds on the shore,' and am, yours gratefully,

"Robert Louis Stevenson."

"Why does Scribbler call himself a stylist?"

"Because he is so successful in rendering his meaning obscure, I suppose."

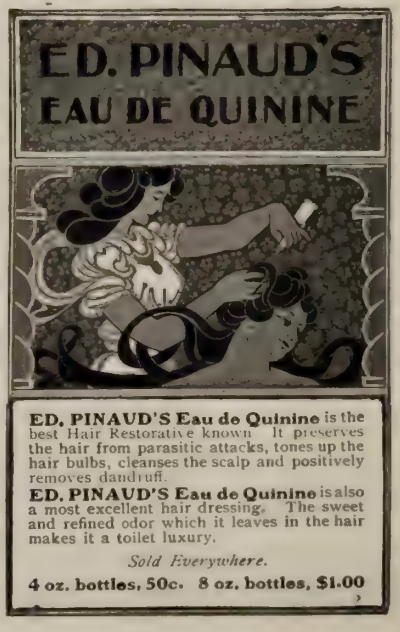
In the Manchu Court

The Misses Yu Kung, writes my correspondent in the Orient, are the social sensation in Peking this season. These young women are the daughters of the former Minister to France. They are in the eyes of all men, chic, svelte, and altogether out of place in the dreary solemnity of the Manchu court. Contrary to the ordinary etiquette of the palace, these exotics of the Parisian salons are permitted to go abroad. They visit the various legations and are received there because they are court ladies—if they were mere daughters of merchants or mandarins their mixed blood would stain their 'scutcheon with the bar sinister, and the proud legation dames of Peking are very much averse to anything that is not a legitimate blazon. The favor of the Empress Dowager, however, covers a multitude of sins other than her own, and the legation ladies pretend to excuse the Misses Yu Kung on the plea that, after all, they couldn't prevent the accident of their birth.

The Empress's Standard

These young women speak Chinese with a decided French accent which is said to be the funniest noise in China. They have taught the imperial princesses the figures of the German and cotillions are danced every evening in the presence of the Empress Dowager, before that amiable old lady lies down to pleasant dreams of decapitated reformers and torture inflicted on those who hate the Manchus. There is a scandalous story afloat in the foreign settlement that the partners of the princesses in these cotillions are the eunuchs of the Imperial household. Some of these foreigners are exceedingly venomous in their hatred of the Empress Dowager and are constantly circulating the most flagrant slanders concerning her entourage. One of these malignant whispers is to the effect that the only reason Her Majesty does not smoke opium is because she is so vain of her complexion. It is not denied, however, that the old lady smokes the vilest tobacco and prefers it. Her silver water pipe, properly studded with precious jewels, is constantly filled with common Chinese tobacco of the rankest quality, and her favorite cigarette is the "Peacock," a coolie smoke of the worst American variety, sold in the Mongol market at the rate of three packages for five copper cash. That the tobacco habit of the Dowager is wilfully depraved, is apparent in the fact that she provides the daintiest Persian cigarettes for the ladies of her court and gold-tipped Egyptians for her eunuchs.

Their Doubtful Pedigree



The mother of the Misses Yu Kung is never mentioned in polite or diplomatic circles except for the purpose of reflecting on the daughters. That she was, or is, a white woman is conceded. The mystery involves the nationality of Yu Kung's wife—it is said that he married her after the birth of the elder Miss Kung. It is a disputed point as to whether the father of Madame Kung was a Yankee sea captain or an English beachcomber. In lieu of an exact lineage, the tiffin gossip of the legations has settled that the mother of the court favorites was born in Canada.

Their Debut in Oriental Togs

There is no question, however, in the diplomatic coteries that the Misses Yu Kung are highly accomplished. There are ten pianos in the Yellow Palaces and they perform on all of these. They speak French, English, Italian, Spanish, German and the Mandarin dialect of Chinese. In view of the probability that Russian may soon be the language of the Chinese court, these young women are now endeavoring to master that thick tongue. When they came to the Imperial Court they were gowned in the very latest creations of Worth, but the conservative element of the

At this time of year every one is looking forward to the festive Thanksgiving season, though probably were the unfortunate turkeys able to express their ideas on the subject they would enter a most energetic protest. There are few households in San Francisco that will not fare on that unhappy bird Thanksgiving Day, washed down by the generous vintages of the State, though amongst what Thackeray calls the "hupper suckles" champagne will be the crowning touch to the feast, and it goes without saying that among the cognoscenti no other champagne than Ayala will be tolerated, because well they know that by being faithful to that beverage they will have no cause for regret on the following day.

Household made strenuous objection, declaring that there was enough foreign innovation in the Empire without making a perpetual parade of it in the dress of the palace inmates. It was finally agreed that the Emperor should decide and the young women were ordered to appear before His Majesty first in the gorgeous brocades of the Manchus and then in their handsomest Parisian gowns. The day of judgment dawned and the entire court assembled in the throne room. The Empress Dowager sat in state on a dais one step higher than that occupied by the Emperor. The Misses Yu Kung came "left upper entrance" and stood under the calcium for the Imperial inspection. While the Emperor was trying to blink the dazzle of that splendid presence out of his vision, his masterful aunt decided the question for him. "That will do, young ladies," she said, in her softest, purring Pekingese. "You may retire. You could not look lovelier in anything else, and you will continue to wear the Manchu dress. There will be no further display. The audience is ended."

Her Affable Majesty

In her social relations the Yellow Empress is not such a bad lot. She can smile as sweetly as a Borgia, and the Cenci was not more lamb-like in her superficial expression. She can purr like a suckling tigress, and she is generous in her gifts as the Greeks of the Troad. Since her abortive attempt to massacre all the foreigners in China she has assumed the repentant humility of a condemned criminal. The ladies of the foreign legations are all welcome at her audiences, and only the ladies themselves quarrel concerning who shall kow-tow in the presence and the order of precedence. She is especially condescending to the ladies of the American Legation and frequently "has them in" to an afternoon tea in her private apartments. She gave one of these "informal affairs" on the Monday following the execution of the Reformer, Shen Chien, and it is reported that on this occasion the old lady was unusually amiable, laughing heartily at every little jest flung aside by her guests for translation into choice literary Chinese by the interpreter. Ten automobiles have recently been supplied by a French maker for the progressive element of the Forbidden City, and it requires all the influence of the Dowager's favorite eunuch, Li Lien-ying, to keep the festive old dame out of them while they are in operation. So fearful are the guardians of this imperial calamity that something will occur to deprive the gods of their most efficient instrument for the plaguing of the Chinese, that they suspect the intention of a French motor car. There is a tinge of selfishness also in this solicitude for the health and welfare of Huang Tai Han. If anything fatal should happen to her Li Lien-ying and his faction would immediately march through the Shun Chih Gate and their heads would gargoyle the buttresses of the Tartar City. The Empress Dowager is a very dangerous personage, living or dead, and those whom she loveth, her enemies will chasten when she has abdicated the throne which she has so unscrupulously usurped.

An Heir Wanted

An absurd story is afloat that it is the Emperor's desire to marry the Misses Yu Kung. There are various insurmountable reasons why this dual marriage cannot happen. In the first place the father of the young women is not of proper rank to enable his daughters to enter the seraglio of an Emperor. He is a mere statesman, like Wu Ting Fang, for whom nothing better than a foreign mission could be provided. If his daughters were received as the sixth and seventh wives of Huang Hsu, he would be at once raised to the rank of a prince and that would disturb the political and personal calculations of the palace factions. As the only object of another inmate of the Imperial harem is to provide an heir to the throne from the family of the Emperor, and as five wives have not gratified this hope, it is deemed useless to send any more women into the Emperor's already overstocked family. The principal reason, however, why the Misses Yu Kung may not attain to imperial eminence in this regard is because the Emperor's aunt, who is also the aunt of his head wife, and duenna in ordinary to the entire Imperial outfit, does not approve of the proposed double-headed alliance.

Career of a Sacramento Boy

There is a strong portrait of Lincoln Steffens in the current Bookman, reproduced from a painting by Miss Ben Yusuf. Lincoln Steffens is regarded nowadays as a great reformer, but when he started out as a writer on the subject of municipal corruption he was imbued with no high ideals. He was intent only on making a living. He is not of the chronic reformer type, but he has done much good work in exposing corruption in municipal politics. In Sacramento, where he was raised, he was an ordinary lad who loved such pastimes as hunting, fishing and riding, and after graduating from St. Matthew's military school he went to Berkeley, graduating from the university in 1889. Then he studied in the universities of Leipzig, France, Berlin and Heidelberg, his father's idea being to have him attain thorough academic knowledge before entering business life. But an early marriage with a fellow-student abroad changed his plans. He found he must begin to make a living for his wife as well as himself, and so he went into literature. He received forty-five dollars for a story from Harper's, but that success was not immediately followed by another. He tried to get on one of the New York newspapers, but it was only after much solicitation that the Evening Post agreed to give him a space job. Mr. Steffens says he made only one dollar and seventy-five cents the first week. But afterwards he made a hit with a Wall street assignment and then his rise was rapid. He was detailed at police headquarters for several years, and during the Parkhurst crusade and under the Roosevelt regime became familiar with the topics which he later wrote of and which have given him his present secure and high place as a prophet of reform.

In the Upper Thirteen

The winter season of festivities is on among the Upper Thirteen of San Rafael. The Browne-Krag wedding gave it considerable impetus last Saturday, and next week there are to be two "at homes" at which two daughters of the Marin aristocracy will "come out." The two young women have been "out" in society for at least two years; that is, as far out as it is possible for any one to go in the festive circles of the Upper Thirteen, and nobody knows just why their parents desire to spring them as debutantes at this late day, but it is suspected that the debut of Miss Christine Pomeroy is responsible for one of the impending functions. Prior to the elevation of Mrs. Pomeroy from the ranks of the Upper Thirteen she was a neighbor of the mother of one of the candidates for social honors, and her daughter was the chum of the girl who is about to make her tardy formal debut. When Mrs. Pomeroy emerged from the obscurity of San Rafael into the metropolitan limelight, and opened her social campaign which has proved so successful, the two girls drifted apart. Meanwhile the Upper Thirteenite, who by the way is the wife of a clerk in the village, had to content herself within the circumscribed rural field, for Mrs. Pomeroy was not inclined to imperil with dubious freight the frail craft in which she had embarked on the uncertain social sea. But it has been noticed that since the drifting apart of the erstwhile neighbors, the Upper Thirteenite has made a practice of matching each of Mrs. Pomeroy's entertainments with one of her own. Hence nobody was surprised when, after the Pomeroy tea, it was learned that the Upper Thirteenite had decided to have an "at home" for the presentation of her daughter.

The Wine Flowed

The Browne-Krag wedding in San Rafael created as great a sensation over the strait as did the Goelet-Roxburghe marriage in New York. From the viewpoint of the Upper Thirteen it was a "sumptuous affair." Champagne was served, and that circumstance alone was sufficient to make it a notable function in the social annals of Marin. The wedding was pulled off on Saturday night because the flower of the Upper Thirteen's manhood has to be at the office betimes each morning in the week except on the Sabbath. Saturday night is the one night in which joy may be unconfined, and consequently the Krag-Browne wedding was a highly successful affair and "the wine flowed like water," much to the delight of the guests.

Where Blacks Hold Sway

There is fighting again in San Domingo, the most picturesque of the tropical islands of the Antilles. The ups and downs of the political parties which have kept San Domingo plunged in civil strife, with only an occasional breathing spell of two or three years, makes a long and dreary record. Four years ago Isidro Jiminez, the leader of the more moderate faction of the Liberal party, became President after the overthrow and assassination of President Heureaux. Horacio Vasquez, the leader of the more strenuous faction of the same party, was Vice-President, and appealed to the people to support Jiminez. But not long after Vasquez and Jiminez fell out, and the latter was forced to seek safety in flight to New York. Now the Jiminez party are the revolutionists, their leader is back in the island, and the probability is that Vasquez will soon be the fugitive. San Domingo, by the way, is the only place in the world in which blacks, slaves and descendants of slaves, have ever wrested the supremacy from their white masters. They established their autonomy and up to this time have succeeded in maintaining it. There are two negro Republics in the island. The Republic of Hayti occupies the western third, and the Republic of San Domingo the eastern two-thirds. The Haytians are French-speaking negroes and most of them are pure bloods. Their country is therefore called the black republic. Most of the Dominicans are mulattoes and their language is Spanish. This country has long felt an interest in the Republic of San Domingo because its trade is chiefly with the United States, while that of Hayti is with France.

He Hadn't the Price

Addison Mizner likes to run an automobile but he has never been granted a chauffeur's license. The other day he was speeding through the Park when he encountered a policeman who, seeing no number on his machine, hailed him and demanded to see his license. "I haven't any," said Mizner, "but I'm going down as fast as I can to get it." He was allowed to go, and presently he was stopped by another officer who wanted to see his license. "I am on my way to give an exhibition of my skill in order to get one," said Mizner. Again he was permitted to depart, but a few moments later he encountered another uniformed functionary who halted him, and he repeated the statement that he was on his way to give an exhibition.

"Very well," said the officer, "this is the place where the exhibitions are given; get busy."

"It's no use," said Mizner, "I haven't the two dollars to pay for the license."

tee without expressing dissatisfaction with the way in which the affairs of the organization are being managed, I believe they were far from enthusiastic over the conduct of the business. The committee has done some good work at the expense of the merchants of the city, but expenses grew in a manner that did not appear to be justifiable. Of late expenses have been curtailed, and Rufus Jennings, the executive officer of the committee, is now performing the duties of secretary with a view of earning his salary.

The Nobility Escaped

Some of our society people will be surprised when they learn that they missed an opportunity to kow-tow to some very distinguished representatives of the British nobility. The cousins of the Duke of Roxburghe were here for a week, and were scarcely noticed though the dailies were devoting a deal of space to the Duke's nuptials and the aftermath thereof in the East. The party was under the guidance of Captain, the Hon. C. H. Guest, a first cousin of the Duke. In the party were his sister, Lady Rodney, and Sir Bryan and Lady Leighton. Captain Guest is a son of Lord Winbourne and a descendant of the famous Admiral of that name. Sir Bryan Leighton is a cousin of Sir Frederick Leighton of the Royal Academy. Lady Rodney is a striking looking woman with perfectly white hair. Some years ago her husband, Lord Rodney, disappeared, and at the same time a pretty young governess employed in the family dropped from view. Neither has ever been heard of since.

The Overpowering Presence of Money

Though the newspapers of this country refrained from criticism of the vulgar show made by the Goelet family on the occasion of the recent purchase of a coronet, the London press discussed the affair quite freely. This is what the Daily Mail had to say: "We may congratulate ourselves that the barbaric debauch of color, perfume and expensiveness did not take place in this country. Everything emblematic of mere religion seems to have been obliterated under the sensuous garment of materialized wealth. It is in moments like this that the Americans surpass the civilized and barbaric world. The supposable overpowering presence of money compensates them for any slight defects in good taste and restraint. The Duke of Roxburghe, with his simple English bringing up, makes an odd figure in the crowd, almost a pathetic one, lacking even the reassuring consciousness of ante-nuptial settlements."

The George Howards of San Mateo have returned from their trip to Europe. Mr. Howard has been perfecting himself in architecture at the Beaux Arts in Paris.

Mrs. Mills's Birthday

Mrs. C. T. Mills will be the hostess at a large reception this afternoon at the Sorosis Club, when the alumnæ of Mills College will be the guests. Mrs. Mills had a birthday on Wednesday, and the teachers at Mills' surprised her with the gift of a beautiful clock which runs a year without winding. Some of the classes also contributed surprise-gifts, and they have subscribed liberally toward the erection of the new clock tower. Perhaps the prettiest feature of the day was the rendition of Mrs. Mills's favorite hymns, as a morning serenade before her door. Five of the students who are violinists prepared this surprise for her awakening, and it was very pleasing to Mrs. Mills. It is thirty-two years, by the way, since Rev. and Mrs. Cyrus T. Mills founded the institution that bears their name. They had been in charge of the Young Ladies' Seminary at Benicia before that, but it was in August, 1871, that Mills Seminary had its beginning.

Dr. Grant Selfridge has returned from a month's rest in Santa Barbara and has resumed his practice.

George H. Ismon, whose resignation from the Western management of the Pacific Steel and Wire Works I noted a few days ago, has been replaced by Mr. A. T. De Forrest, of Cleveland, Ohio, whose advent to this business sphere has excited some interest. Mr. De Forrest has reached high business and social heights in the East, and I am told that he was compelled by reason of his ill health to abandon most agreeable surroundings in Cleveland and accept the new position in California.

Talent From the East

Mr. Hearst has selected his managing editor for his new Los Angeles daily, in a Mr. Farrally, who has been filling an executive position on the New York American. He is reputed to be one of the brightest newspaper men in New York. The supposition is that several New York men will be sent out to start the new daily on its way, not that Mr. Hearst lacks confidence in Californians, but because there is a shortage of first class newspaper talent in this city at present.

The Irrepressible Lane

Mr. Franklin K. Lane confesses that he was pained to learn that his post-election epistle was misinterpreted. He has taken the trouble to write to the dailies to explain to the dear public just what he meant when he said he never thought he could win. The habit of equivocation is so strong in Mr. Lane that it is hard for him to be explicit. But it doesn't matter much what he did mean when he wrote that letter. I know that Mr. Lane has superb confidence in himself, but it is useless for him to attempt a miracle. He is not endowed with divine power. He cannot resurrect himself.

Patti will give two concerts here in January. Full particulars will be given in a few days, but it is known that the concerts will be given in the Mechanics' Pavilion. On Monday night Patti made her first appearance outside of New York, at the Academy of Music in Philadelphia. From three o'clock in the afternoon there began to grow a line of people from the Academy door running around into the side streets and three abreast. It was reckoned that before six o'clock this line amounted to about two thousand people; at any rate, it took forty policemen to keep them in order. The receipts of the concert were within a few dollars of fifteen thousand.

Madame Fabbri-Muller's third subscription program in English and German will be given next Tuesday evening in Golden Gate hall. The entertainment will include "Chums," the one-act farce, a song and dance by Helen Darling and a tambourine dance by Irene Shenernon, and two German playlets.

At "Guests' Day" of the Papyrus Club last week the program arranged by Ella V. McCloskey included violin solos by Adele Wellisch, alto songs by Edith Hanks, and readings by Esther Malcolm Johnson, with an address by Rabbi Nieto

An invitational musicale was given at Mr. H. B. Pasmore's studio last Friday evening, when some of his pupils rendered the program. Those taking part were Mrs. L. A. Larsen, Mrs. Florence Wyman Gardner, Mrs. Edith Phelps Collins, Miss Lida Benedict, Miss Aldanita Wolfskill, Miss Louise Smith and Frank Figone, assisted by Miss Edith Adams, one of Arthur Fickenscher's piano pupils.

Society's "Stage" Jewels

When Mrs. Cornelia Baxter Tevis was sued by a Los Angeles jeweler for an "imitation" diamond and pearl necklace, a secret of society's grand dames was thereby given away. Those who fancied that the magnificent gems worn by wealthy women at theatre, opera and ball are all real were undeceived. They know now that though society women possess valuable jewels, they do not always wear them in public. Indeed, they rarely do. What they wear is a clever imitation of their diamond and pearl tiaras, necklaces, pendants, etc. There are probably more Alexandra jewels worn by American society women than the unitiated have any idea of. There is one New York jeweler who makes a specialty of what is called "jewelry of reconstructed gems." He copies the jewels of some of the most exclusive society women of the United States. The Alexandra factory is in Vienna, where diamonds, rubies and emeralds are turned out to order. The famous fish-skin pearls are also his invention. It must not be supposed that these gems are cheap things, to be bought for a song. Not a bit of it. They are as valuable in their own way as the originals after which they pattern. There is art in the copy, an art that is the product of long experience in manufacturing imitation gems that defy detection. But the woman who loves the blaze of jewels about her person and cannot afford to pay thousands to gratify her desire can be happy at the cost of hundreds instead. For instance a diamond dog collar set with pearls, which in the real thing would be not less than twenty-five thousand dollars, can in the "reconstructed gems" be obtained for two hundred and seventy-five dollars. An exquisite emerald and diamond ring, worth in the genuine from twelve hundred to two thousand five hundred dollars, can be bought for thirty-eight dollars. The beauty of it is that these Alexandra jewels not only defy detection, but are actually worn by high and mighty dames of the land who would scorn anything like deception, but do not object to wearing gems copied from the originals in their strong-box. These women, with millioned husbands, like the feeling of safety that is the accompaniment of the knowledge that, though they make a magnificent jeweled showing to the public, there is no fear of being despoiled of their jewel-cases' valuable contents. And if these women like the reconstructed jewels so well, and give them the cachet of their approval, there is no reason why the women in moderate circumstances should not do the same.

An Episode

By Barnett Franklin.

Lawrence Rixford, man-about-town, sat in his luxurious bachelor apartments, contemplating suicide. Nothing unusual—or, for that matter, alarming—lay in that fact, however; it had been almost a bi-weekly happening for some little time past.

His general action on the occasions of these moody soliloquies bore an unvarying degree of sameness. All his grievances against the world in general—and no one in particular—were gone over, singly and collectively, in elaborate detail, seemingly gaining added bitterness by each subsequent rehearsal.

It was in one of these periodical maunderings that Rixford had actually coined an epigram, the kind that falls to the lot of the Cynical Character in the Problem Drama.

"Happiness,"—it ran—"happiness is a mirage—a never to be reached oasis in the desert of life.'

He wondered, too, if one of all his "countless" friends would be pained to know that he had gone from them. He recalled having come across, somewhere,—"A man only finds out his friends when he is in need, and then, he only finds out how that would apply in his case."

When he had reached this stage of his soliloquy, he would generally take a brandy-and-soda and think better of it all. But tonight he seemed to have forgotten the usual antidote and sank back deeper into the soft cushions of the chair.

The twilight shadows slowly began to fall. He roused himself from his lethargy, walked slowly to the window, and looked out into the approaching night. Down below, in the almost deserted street, a ribbon of lights sputtered jerkily for a moment and then burned evenly on.

He had been standing so for some little time when a sudden rustle of silk told that someone had entered the room.

"A very novel welcome, I am sure," a highly pitched feminine voice rattled off, "not even a light! And,"—her glance had evidently taken in the table-top, strewn with burnt matches and cigar stubs—"this hardly resembles the proverbial festive board. But," she laughed, "I forgot, Lawrence, you always were considered original."

Rixford recalled vaguely his suggestion for a little supper that evening with Thelma—Thelma Glynesk of the Theatre Burlesque—his latest infatuation. He had forgotten completely.

"Do you know,"—he spoke very slowly and very solemnly—"do you know of what I was thinking when you entered the room?"

"Of me, no doubt," she answered archly.

"I was thinking," Rixford replied, "I was thinking of throwing myself from this window."

She rushed forward and clutched his arm.

"Don't, Lawrence," she cried, "don't!"

He turned and looked at her, half pleased, half surprised at the intensity in her words. Like flashes the thoughts ran through his brain. Had he been wrong? Of all the rest, did this tinseled woman of a mimic world care? He scarcely knew what to think.

"That is," she went on, "that is—unless you are sure it is for the better and you feel that there is nothing more in life that you should live it. But"— her voice took on an added tensity—"if you must not be dissuaded, and sui-

Evening Dresses Reduced

Naturally, at this season of the year, evening dresses are the subject of much discussion and thought in feminine minds. Many of the best dressers in California solve at The Emporium the perplexing problem of "What shall we wear."

At present our imported model gowns and wraps are being sold at about the cost of importation (in many cases much less). This affords an opportunity of purchasing Paris garments at prices you ordinarily pay for domestic makes.

Our gowns are the cleverest creations of the foremost European and American designers. From the least expensive Crepe de Chine costume at $37.50 to one at $200 (recently reduced from $500), you readily see the prevailing superiority of style and the reasonableness of prices.

Pretty Crepe de Chine Dresses, beautifully trimmed and silk lined throughout, $45 values for $37.50

Other extremely handsome models for afternoon and evening wear, ranging from $45.00, $50.00

$60.00, $75.00
$85.00
up to $200.00

Fads and Fancies

New York, November 14, 1903.

My dear Belle,

Lend me your ear. This is to be the liveliest season ever, in New York, and I am already in the vortex of the mad whirl. I hate to tell you about it because I know it will make you feel bad. Dear old mamma has urged me to bear in mind the golden rule of moderation. As if moderation were not the very last thing to be popular in these giddy days. The betwixt and between people are always ineffably dull. To be sure, I was at the birth of the new Duchess. It was a great crush and the polloi behaved like wild beasts. The interior of the church looked like fairyland. Hundreds of growing palms and shrubs lined the walls, the pulpit was a mass of orchids and asparagus vines and the altar was massed with white lilies. Heavy ropes of white roses, tied with knots of broad white satin ribbon, were garlanded on the chancel railing and choir stalls. From the tops of the stone columns baskets of growing English promroses hung. The bride's white satin gown was covered with tulle and chiffon, as well as point d'Alencon, and fully trimmed with lace.

By the way, the New York men of fashion are trying what they call the new English walk, in imitation of his Grace of Roxburghe. He walks with his aristocratic head thrust forward, and so of course he has imitators. A defect in people of exalted station is regarded as a grace by their social inferiors.

The latest dictum of the photographers is that if people want pleasing, natural portraits of themselves, they would do well to wear their old and comfortable clothes, instead of coming dressed out in all their newest, smartest and tightest-fitting finery, in which they are obviously uncomfortable and ill-at-ease. Who is not familiar with the vain smirk born of the consciousness of the new and elaborate gown? Who does not admire the careless, artictic, graceful and—of course—perfectly natural way in which the evening cloak or wrap or lace scarf is thrown back to show to best advantage the fair sitter's pretty neck and shapely bust, or finely moulded arm?

The women here look stunning in tailored gowns. All seem to have long coats, plain sleeves and small, flat collars. The skirts of these are walking length nearly always, though there are some dreams, with amazing trains, but the latter are mostly worn when one goes in a carriage. Who doesn't here, though?

I saw Mrs. George Gould in a black doe-skin made walking length, with a coat perfectly plain, coming to within six or eight inches of the hem. It was very becoming to her extremely matronly figure. One does see innumerable Etons on smart people, too. Mrs. Ogden Mills and Miss Beatrice have gowns of this style made wonderfully alike, only the mater's are more elaborate. Hats are just medium size, mostly close at the back, but all have some crown. You must get one or two turned or rolled up at one side with a splashing plume.

For coats to go with costumes for "dress up occasions" they have three-quarter skirts, too, but these are attached at the waistline. With these, immense turned back cuffs and lace ruffles must be worn, not to omit the lovely fluffy jabots from neck to waist in front. Then, with light-colored gowns even for street wear, you must have hose to match. How tastes change! A few years ago, a woman in light-colored hose, black shoes and a hat (with, of course, a dress and other accessories) looked too funny, we thought.

For evening frocks, I need not tell you about the tight sleeves with elbow "fixings" reaching even to the knees, for even tardy San Francisco was wearing them when I left, in September. Mustard yellow is a fad, appearing in velvet, satin, crepe de chine voile, etc. Champagne and oyster white are with us still, and red in sudden splashes on frocks and coats especially, is very stunning.

As for furs—oh! they are glorious. Everything is flat over the shoulders, with stoles and long cords to hold the sides tighter. Chinchilla with baby lamb and moleskin with ermine are stylish combinations. I don't think San Francisco is ever so late about styles in furs as in other things, strange to say, for we need them so little. But have the fur scarfs appeared yet? They end, either broad or narrow, at the breast or the waist, shoulder length, and are either merely crossed chastely or brought together something along four-in-hand lines. Flat pocket-books are of course de rigeuer and fans look as if made for big dolls. O, yes! shoes. After inveighing for decades against high heels, shoemakers and doctors are at last yielding to the needs of the arched foot which is wretched and clumsy in a flat heel, so the lucky arch-instepped lady may now put her foot into heavy as need be, thick-soled walking shoes with nice, comfortable Cuban heels, and look just as consistent in her tailored gown as her flat-heeled, long-vamped sister. It all depends on the foot if the shoe fits it.

We've been to ever so many luncheons, dinners and things. In homes, affairs seem to run to few courses long drawn out—an English innovation where the health and beauty fad has invaded the society dinner and ordered the aspirant to munch, not chew. The bunched floral centrepieces seem to have vanished for dinners and low vases here and there, with a blossom or two, or dwarfed growing plants occasionally, are substituted. The background is a handsomely embroidered "runner," giving the key to the general color scheme. On round tables (which I believe are coming in for even tremendous dinner-parties) centrepieces seem to be used yet with tulle, usually over the "dinner color"-silk surrounding it. You must "squash" the tulle in here and there and drop on a blossom or a piece of fern. Nasturtium, trailing vines with vigorous little blooms look lovely this crisp weather. If you can get any autumn leaves try some for a change without a flower in view—just fruit. Of course you know that all shades now for candles, or table-lights of any description, must be trimmed with beaded fringes, at least four inches long.

Sherry's, Delmonico's, the Holland House, the Marie Antoinette, the Waldorf, all those places and lots of others are just as sumptuous as ever. When, oh, when will they, however, provide good music with the rest of the luxuries and when, alas! when shall San Francisco restaurants have cloak-rooms for our dainty maids and matrons, that their wraps and those of their escorts may not add to the stuffiness of the dining-halls? As to the matter of cafes and hotel dining-rooms, don't you think San Francisco is really little New York? Only,—whisper it not in Gath—our restaurateurs never bother about floral decorations, which is almost absurd in a land where flowers are almost as free as the air. I have to laugh at their funny flowers here, even at the swellest florists' shops. But good-night.

Sincerely,

Francesca.

cide"—she shuddered a little at the word—"is all that is left, let your last act be a noble one. Leave a note saying that it was hopeless love for me that drove you to it. Think!" she fairly cried in her enthusiasm, "think what a glorious advertisement that will be for me!"

Were it not for her ready support he must needs have fallen to the floor; but he flung her from him and fairly staggered to his desk. Without the hesitation of a moment he pulled a drawer and snatched from within—a little vial labeled arsenic. Then he drained it at a gulp to take away the bad taste.

In Financial Circles

Consequent upon Eastern money rates stiffening, the transactions in Bonds during the week showed a falling off, while the volume of trading in shares shows quite an increase.

Trading in Bonds aggregates $45,000, and in stocks 3,903 shares, divided as follows: 1,611 shares Lighting stocks, 1,210 shares Water stocks, 327 shares Miscellaneous, stocks, 50 shares Bank stocks, 705 shares Sugar stocks. Fluctuations in S. F. Gas & Electric up to Wednesday were within a narrow margin and were largely influenced by rumors of dividends. Spring Valley Water stock made a new low record mark at $36, but quickly recovered to $39, at which figure the stock remains in good demand. California Wine Association and Alaska Packers' Association came in for a fair share in the decline, yet there was no particular selling pressure. A lot of 50 shares of Anglo-Californian Bank sold at $81, quite a concession from the previous price. Sugar stocks were inactive.

I see "The Stock & Bond Exchange" is issuing a supplemental list of "Unlisted Securities"; this is a good move as it adds quite a number of "dealable" stocks and bonds to the limited number heretofore dealt in.

Iris off the Stage

An Autobiography, and a Woman's Defense of Pinero's Play.

By Virginia Harned Sothern.

You have asked me to write something of the days of my youth and also of my stage career. I was born in Boston but my parents left that city when I was a baby. My father and mother were natives of Virginia. Until I was about twelve years old I lived most of the time with my folks in Washington and Baltimore. When about fourteen years of age I was sent to England, and I attended school there and on the continent. After having spent four or five years at some of the best institutions of learning in Europe I returned to the United States and shortly thereafter had my first experience on the stage. My chief reason for entering the dramatic profession was to make, if possible, my own way in the world. I was desirous of occupying an independent position; therefore I chose the stage, believing it afforded the best means for earning a livelihood—one that brought better returns than any other avocation a young woman might engage in. I did not know that I had any dramatic talent and the only way to find out was to become one of the bread-winners in the profession. I had no particular theories as to how the stage might be improved or anything of that kind. In fact, I may as well say that I entertained no thoughts upon this subject. The stage was a fixed institution and I had no part in its creation. If I possessed talent, which must of course be developed, well and good—if not, I could retire and devote my attention to something else. Or I might have married, and thus been relieved of the burden of making my own way in the world. What success I have made in my profession is, I think, fairly well known and understood by a large percentage of the theatre-going people of this country. My first engagement was with a company playing Robson and Crane's old success, "Our Boarding House." My next engagement was that of leading lady with George Clarke of the Augustin Daly company playing "The Corsican Brothers" and "False Shame." This was my first and only financial disaster—that is, the plays were not successes as presented by Mr. Clarke's company. For two years I played throughout the South and West, the leading female part in "A Night Off," which role had been made famous by Ada Rehan. I also played with Harry Lacy in "The Still Alarm." My first New York engagement followed in Sedley Brown's "A Long Lane," after which I joined Louis Aldrich's company, playing the comedy part of Florence Featherly in "The Editor." While in this company I was engaged by Daniel Frohman as leading lady for Edward H. Sothern. My first character with Mr. Sothern was that of Clara Baxter in "The Maister of Woodbarrow." I also appeared with Mr. Sothern in "Lord Chumley," "The Dancing Girl," and "Captain Letterblair," playing the leading female parts. Leaving Daniel Frohman's management, I joined A. M. Palmer's stock company, then presenting "Lady Windermere's Fan." I believe I was the first to play the leading role in that play in the United States. I afterward acted such roles as Letty Fletcher in "Saints and Sinners" and Mrs. Sylvester in "The New Woman." It was following this that I originated the part of Trilby and soon again rejoined Mr. Sothern's company and played with him for a few seasons. In 1896 Mr. Sothern and I were married. I have frequently played with him since our marriage in his productions. Two years ago, I made my debut as a star under the management of Charles Frohman in "Alice of Old Vincennes," a dramatization of the novel of that name written by the late Maurice Thompson of Crawfordsville, Indiana, a fellow townsman of General Lew Wallace. A year ago last September I originated Iris Bellamy in Arthur Wing Pinero's play, "Iris." I am now on my second tour in this play, still under the management of Charles Frohman. At the termination of my present tour, I will appear at the Criterion theatre in New York, under the management of Mr. Frohman, presenting a new play, "The Light that Lies in Woman's Eyes," written by my husband, Mr. Sothern. This play was given its premier at the Columbia theatre, Washington, D. C., in September last, where it met with most pronounced approval. It was produced at that time so that Mr. Sothern could be present and direct the rehearsals. The scenes of this play are located at Stratford-on-Avon, the home of William Shakespeare, one of the scenes showing the interior of Anne Hathaway's cottage, where the immortal bard wooed and won the buxom Anne. I need not say that I will not regret when my time comes to appear in another play. The character of Iris Bellamy seems to me to be so generally misunderstood that it makes it unpleasant to appear in this role. Mr. Pinero has never written an uninteresting play. He is, without doubt, the one great master of his art now living. He seems to possess an understanding of human nature so far in advance of those who decry his plays, that comparisons are useless. To say that Iris Bellamy is unnatural is to set oneself down as being densely ignorant of existing conditions. The play "Iris" is in my opinion as true to life as if it were a newspaper report of individuals bearing the names of Iris, Trenwith, Maldonado, etc. The characters are all products of a vicious conventionalism that is quite generally known to exist. Contrary to the general run of plays, the author does not cater to public sentiment by having everything "turn out well." He is dealing with living types to be found in Europe and America, and he tells the truth to the very last line of the play. It is a bit amusing to read many of the attacks made upon Mr. Pinero for his alleged immorality in "Iris" and to find in the adjoining column of the same newspaper the nauseating details of the divorce court. I am not defending Iris Bellamy in her weakness, but to take the position that the author of the play goes to extremes in the creation of his principal characters, is not in accordance with the facts. As unpleasant as the character of Iris Bellamy may be to the average auditor, Mr. Pinero has unquestionably held aloft the true mirror of nature. I do not believe that it is possible to fully comprehend all the motives of the author by seeing "Iris" only once. It is a play that not only bears study, but seems to demand it to understand its full import. Take as an illustration, the signing of the first cheque by Mrs. Bellamy, in the cheque-book given her by Maldonado. She has been used to signing cheques all her life and the mere thought that this fatal cheque is out of the ordinary does not occur to her. The spirit in which she gives this particular cheque, to help out a deserving young woman, of itself should convey to an intelligent mind that it is but the result of her generous nature and heart-felt feeling for the young woman who has lost her money through the dishonesty of the defaulting trustee of her own estate. If she loved money alone for selfish reasons, she certainly would not have drawn this first cheque to be used by another person, but would have declined to render this solicited aid and would have used Maldonado's cheque-book and his money with which to meet her own demands. I fear Mr. Pinero will have to labor very earnestly to make the general public fully understand all of his methods, not that they are intricate or unnatural, but because he is one of the most profound thinkers now engaged in directing his talents in the channels of stage-craft.

The Stage

The Eternal Sex Problem

What a pharisaical lot we are becoming! Fully aware of the fact that Arthur Wing Pinero, the most brilliant of the English-writing dramatists, is addicted to the pastime of holding a mirror up to the social life of people of atrophied morals, we go to the theatre and throw up our hands in holy horror at the dramatic exposition of the character and mental processes of a woman, weak and wanton, who declined to be poor, and who couldn't refuse to use a man's cheque-book. We regard the play as a deliberate affront to our sense of decency, a gauntlet hurled in the faces of the virtuous by a man distinguished as a dramatist for his technical mastery, his profound, unerring knowledge of human nature. Stories of women who have loved, fallen and suffered have been plentiful, and we have seen worse women than Iris Bellamy on the stage, and also in real life. It is absurd to argue that she is an exaggeration or a libel on her sex. Do we not see women marrying for money every day? Are they not worse than Iris Bellamy, who refused to make a sacrilege of the marriage ceremony? If the creation of character is the summum bonum of the dramatist's art, why scruple at Iris Bellamy? Whether you like them or not, Pinero's stage puppets are vital men and women. You don't have to approve their morals to appreciate the art that made them instinct with life. As a dissector of women's minds and a student of tortuous mental processes, Pinero stands pre-eminent among contemporaneous playwrights. His only peer is Ibsen. The shortcomings of his heroes and heroines should not concern the critic searching after the larger meanings. "Iris" is a painful play. So is the "Oedipus Rex" of Sophocles. The bold intimacy of the play is horrible, but it makes you think and having thought you are not in danger of contamination, even though the playwright plainly puts up a defense for the inconstant woman. Iris is a gay young widow in love with Lawrence Trenwith. He is penniless, and she is a bright bird of plumage who requires much expensive sunshine. Her marriage with Trenwith would, by a provision of her husband's will, take away her comfortable fortune. So she refrains from marrying him and accepts him as her lover. Thus does the playwright present an argument against the wills of selfish men in restraint of marriage. The trustee of her estate swindles her out of her fortune and she is left penniless. Trenwith goes away to foreign parts to make a fortune, and it is understood that upon his return they are to be married. Meanwhile she is pursued by a cunning, crafty, unscrupulous and wealthy chap, one Maldonado, who wishes to possess her. He takes advantage of her poverty and leaves his cheque-book within her reach after having given her carte blanche to draw against his account. Now, up to this stage of the proceedings, Iris Bellamy was not a very bad woman. True, she was not virtuous, but she was at least satisfied with one lover, whom she would have married had she not been reluctant to surrender her fortune. It is destructive of one's ideals to have one's sympathy aroused for a sordid woman; but in this twentieth century how rarely do we meet women whose love of Mammon is not stronger than sentiment! Ridiculous? Not at all. Shocking? Yes, but true. It is well to cherish ideals but hypocritical to affect a faith that has little justification. It is not the woman but the man in "Iris" that should excite aversion—this Maldonado who deliberately sets the tempting snare, his purpose being the gratification of his lust. Iris did not jump at the bait. It was the charity in her heart that led her into the brute's power. Her first cheque was drawn to contribute to the relief of a poor woman who had been despoiled by the same man who had wrecked the Bellamy fortune. Even after that she fought against the machinations of the tempter, until, reduced to dire distress, he thrust the key of his sumptuous flat into her hands. Later on Trenwith returns, discovers that Iris is the mistress of Maldonado, and declines to forgive her. It is the way of the world; men exact a degree of constancy that they themselves are incapable of. Maldonado learns of the visit of Trenwith, and in his rage drives his mistress into the street, after which he becomes one of the busiest home destroyers that I have ever seen. He is a man with a temper, and as the curtain goes down he is doing a rough-house stunt, smashing the furniture, and yelling like a savage. It is a powerful portrayal of a vulgarian's passion. The physical evidence of his anger is appalling. "Iris" is a new message in the eternal sex problem, and it is the most brutal one that was ever dramatized. This penchant of Pinero's for exposing human souls is irritating. His choice of material is unfortunate. I should prefer legitimate comedy-drama, but if we must have life's tragedies portrayed upon the stage, it is absurd to protest against the plays of Pinero. He appeals to the tastes of people who have lived, and he does so in a way that offends the squeamish, but there is nothing in "Iris" to promote demoralization. The woman who has sinned is a woman with a conscience who suffers mental torture while drifting to the "greater death." She does not inspire any one with the desire of emulation. The theme is handled with rare artistry, and is more calculated to produce shudders than tears. Virginia Harned's portrayal of Iris Bellamy is convincing. Her work is indicative of the highest quality of temperament. There are no distracting flaws in her art excepting perhaps a tendency to discordant tones. Henry Jewett looks the part of the lustful villain of Hebraic-Spanish extraction, and realistically accentuates the ferocity of the vulgarian. William Courtenay is a handsome and graceful Trenwith, and quite an effective lover. The affectation of the English accent is quite general in this company, and as a consequence the enunciation of some of the mummers is indistinct.

Pinero's "Letty"

Pinero's latest play, on which he has been absorbed ever since he wrote "Iris," two years ago, is "Letty." His genius for vivid characterization is shown in this play, and it is a marvel of workmanship, but the plot is a trifle commonplace. The master dramatist delights in the technique of his craft, and prides himself on creating a great play out of a meagre plot. Letty is a typist in a London bucket shop who falls in love with Nevill Letchmere, gentleman. Letchmere is a gallant but a fairly honorable one, though he comes from a family of dissolutes. He has a sister married to a brute to whom she is true, though she has flirted with the "other man." Letchmere first contemplated an intrigue with Letty, but when he found that she was pure and of a refined nature he fell in love with her. She had half starved herself and run recklessly into debt that she might have gowns in which to accompany him to harmless suppers without causing him to be ashamed of her, but he was a married man and she didn't know it. This is the foundation dexterously developed. When he tells her that he is married, and advises her to marry the bucket-shop keeper, a bounder who is in love with her, she says "Never!" "Well," says Letchmere, "you know where my rooms are. I'll cherish you." "Never!" says poor little Letty, and broken-hearted and in desperation she accepts the bounder. Act third takes place the evening of the same day in a private supper-room of a fashionable restaurant, where Letchmere's beloved sister is saying good-bye forever to the "other man," and has begged her indulgent brother to stay by and keep her from faltering. As the trio leaves, enter Letty and her betrothed, accompanied by friends, the guests of the bounder. The latter begs Letchmere to stay and drink a toast to the bride to be. He consents for love of Letty, leaving his sister and her lover to finish their good-bye alone. In a short time he is offended by the disgusting manners of the host. Letty is humiliated and in torture. "You can't marry such a brute," whispers Letchmere "No, I can't," moans Letty. "You've lost your place at the shop. You're ill and hopelessly in debt. I love you—come with me." She consents and the next act takes place at midnight of the same evening, in Letchmere's apartments where Letty is about to surrender herself, when news comes to Letchmere that his sister has eloped with the "other man." Letchmere forgets Letty in his wrath and grief, and in soliloquy he paints in dark colors his sister's future, in a manner that awakens Letty to a realization of the fact that the same fate awaits her. She begs him to let her go and he leads her forth. She returns in a burst of weakness, and again he leads her forth, though it is a struggle for him to do so. That is all. The prologue, which takes place two years later, is tedious. Letty is married to a funny little photographer, and Letchmere is on his way to a consumptive's grave.

GRACE GOODALL.

A very beautiful girl is the native daughter who has adopted the stage name of Grace Goodall, and who has given much promise at the Alcazar, in such roles as Madame Dufresne in "Zaza," and the ingenuous country maiden, Emma Green, in this week's farce, "The Club's Baby." In private life she is Miss Susan Schultz, and she is the daughter of Mrs. Aristeene Schultz, a choir singer well known in this city and Oakland.

The Envy of the Stage

That was a genuine heart-to-heart interview that Georgie O'Ramey of Fischer's had with Ashton Stevens the other day. It was a revelation to many people of what goes on behind the scenes; of the petty jealousies that afflict the profession, the selfishness, conceit and arrogance that are engendered among those whose business it is to win popular applause, the unmanliness of the men, and the cold and unsympathetic nature of the women. The artist that wins unexpected success invariably incurs the disfavor of all or nearly all the other members of the company. Even stars frown when humble members of the company score a pronounced hit, and it is not unusual for the star to demand the elimination of the song, or speech or hit of business by which the triumph was won. That is one of the worst evils of the star system. It robs many a performance of much that would delight an audience. There are star comedians in comic opera and musical comedy that insist upon occupying a position nearer the footlights, at all times, than any other person, so that they may hold the attention of the audience, by mugging or in some other way, even when others are doing the talking or singing. There are star comedians who at the close of a song that is bound to be encored, insist upon the company's coming out with the recall so that they will be driven back by the applause and thereby testify to the popularity of him whose return has been demanded by the audience. Strange to say, it is the male and not the female mummer whose conceit and selfishness are the most offensive in the profession. The jealous actress is unkind and uncharitable to her own sex, but she does not differ much from most most envious and intriguing women. The envy of the actor asserts itself even in his attitude towards the women of the profession. There is very little of that delicious virtue, gallantry, behind the scenes. In his greed of applause the actor does not differentiate sex. In a local stock company some years ago, an actor who is the pet of club circles was in a musical comedy in which he appeared in a duet with the soubrette, and in which he had all the business. One night the soubrette had an inspiration, and she proceeded to invent a little business that made a tremendous hit. The comedian thought that he was making the hit until he caught sight of the soubrette and then he sulked. At the conclusion of the song he turned his back to the audience and waited until the applause ceased. Later on he complained to the management, and the soubrette was required to cut out her business. When Miss O'Ramey has had more experience in the profession she will find that the coldness of the atmosphere at Fischer's is not unusual. Jealousy is part of the artistic temperament. Last season Julia Marlowe disbanded her company because Frank Worthing was getting too much applause. Every season companies are wrecked by reason of the aggressiveness of the green-eyed monster. But the truth is seldom told. There are not many Georgie O'Rameys in the profession with the courage of their convictions. Illustrations of disgusting envy are of daily occurrence, and if the public were vouchsafed more of them many idols would be shattered. In most instances the managers of theatrical companies are responsible for the dissensions behind the scenes and the injustice that is practiced. The actor or actress that appears to have made a hit dictates to the manager, whose judgment as to the value of talent is not always sound. Augustin Dalys are few and far between. It is the exceptional manager who realizes that judicial boosting, clever stage management and actor-proof parts have much to do with the triumph of mummers.

Farce at the Alcazar

It is an object lesson to fathers to see the way the men in the cast of "The Club's Baby" at the Alcazar handle the child that gives the farce its title. James Durkin handles it as though he were used to handling babies, but the other men are not so successful. They grab the poor infant as a man usually does, with its clothes all bunched about its neck. "The Club's Baby" is amusing from A to Z. There's not a single instant when the audience is not laughing. Farces in which babies figure always serve to draw laughs. I remember one given many years ago at the Bush street theatre, with Charles Bowser and Will Rising as the stars. It was rather a risque thing, and the town was not quite sure whether it ought to go, but the house was packed every night. People scarcely dared say they had seen the play, for it was considered so naughty. Nowadays, they'd go and probably take their children, for we look at such things differently now. Every one in the cast of the Alcazar farce contributes his or her mite to the general perfection of finish, which is what gives these frothy dramatic trifles their hold on the public. It is a long cast, too, much more extensive than is usually allotted to the interpretation of a farce. Miss Block looks her handsomest, and makes a fetching willieboy. But Miss Starr is even better in her boy's clothes and is as natural as if she were accustomed to wear the masculine garments every day of her life. Walter Belasco as Major Plunkett does a fine bit of character work.

A Coincidence

The late Sol Smith Russell, and E. D. Price, now general manager of the Belasco and Mayer enterprises, were warm personal friends from boyhood. Upon the night that Russell gave his opening performance of Edward E. Kidder's "A Poor Relation" at Daly's theatre, New York, he was in a state of nervous apprehension almost bordering upon a break-down, and Price spent the evening in his dressing-room cheering him up between acts. It is a curious coincidence that the play, which yielded the quaint comedian a fortune, is now to have its first stock representation at the Alcazar, which is under Price's immediate direction

Another Tivoli Triumph

Leoncavallo's "Zaza" was sung for the first time in the United States on last Tuesday evening at the Tivoli. It was one of the most ambitious and successful productions that the management has yet given us, and was another reminder of what the Eddy street opera house has done for the musical education of the city. The season which is nearly ended goes out with a flourish, and will be memorable on account of its brilliant production of the new opera. It showed what the Tivoli can do when it is put on its mettle. Every one, including the principals, Steindorff and the orchestra, was unfamiliar with the opera, so that the excellence of the production was quite remarkable. The music of "Zaza" is not very heavy. Indeed in the first act and many times during the opera it is exceedingly light. It contains many exquisite lyrics, especially those that fall to the baritone. Much of it was very reminiscent of "Pagliacci," "Boheme" and even Puccini's "Manon Lescaut." The sparkling music of the first act brings the second act of "Pagliacci" at once to mind, and during the second act the orchestration is very similar to Nedda's beautiful bird song in the same opera. The book of the opera is enough like the drama to make every part of it perfectly understandable without a knowledge of Italian. The omission of the last act, that Belasco tacked on his version, makes the book infinitely more artistic. De Spada as Zaza did the best dramatic work she has done this season. She was particularly good in the last act with Dufresne. Gregoretti, although too loverlike for Cascar, acted with discretion and sang superbly. A solo in the first act and the duet with Zaza in the fourth act had to be repeated twice before the audience would let him go. Ischierdo as Dufresne did creditable work but took his high notes very badly. Marchesini as Zaza's mother was mildly amusing, but her loud dressing was a little overdone. Dado, Miss Barker, Napoleoni and Cortesi all did well with the parts allotted to them. An amusing thing about the costuming of the play was that Miss Barker, who had the role of Zaza's stage rival, was dressed so that she looked startlingly like Mrs. Leslie Carter in the part—red hair and all. When she entered in the first act every one thought that she was De Spada and began to applaud. De Spada's dressing was very sub-

A Record-Breaker

"Ben Hur" has broken all records at the Grand. It is having a phenomenal run considering the prices, and I hear that the success of the production is so much greater than was expected, that New York managers who have heard the news are now thinking of booking attractions for this coast, that they heretofore regarded as too expensive. There are very few cities in the country, outside of New York, in which "Ben Hur" or any other production could draw four consecutive weeks at the prices charged at the Grand, and to the extent to which the great spectacular play has drawn. The receipts for one of the performances at the Mission street play-house were larger than those of any previous single performance of the play. To the credit of the management be it said, the public has received fair play from the beginning of the engagement, notwithstanding the strenuosity of the scalpers.

At the Orpheum

"A Stand-Off," in which appear the old Alcazar favorites, Wright Huntington and Florida Kingsley, assisted by Alex Keamey, is one of the prettiest playlets that the Orpheum patrons have been offered in a long time. The bill this week is a particularly good one. Sara and Bella-Rosa are remarkably agile and strong jugglers and the Zolars are daring and dashing equilibrists. The Brittons, who are not new here, have added some novel steps to their remembered buck and wing stunt. Albert Bellman and Lottie Moore are an exceptionally talented team and have scored quite a hit. The catchy dialogue and songs of Warren and Blanchard lend variety to a fine program.

Ellery's Royal Italian Band Returns

The Royal Italian Band, increased by five new soloists, including a remarkable flutist, will return to the Alhambra for another short season opening Sunday night, December sixth, and continuing until Sunday night the thirteenth inclusive. Matinees will be given Wednesday, Saturday and Sunday. During this engagement an entirely new repertoire will be given and special nights such as Wagner, French composers and Italian operatic will be given. Saturday night, December twelfth, will be a popular "rag time" smoker on the lines of the famous London smoking concerts, where one can enjoy good, jolly music and the fragrant weed at the same time. Popular prices will prevail during this engagement, the reserved seats being seventy-five cents and fifty cents, with box seats at one dollar.

A feature of "I-O-U," which will be Fischer's next attraction, is the music, every number of which, from the opening overture on, has been composed by Dr. H. J. Stewart. Seats are now on sale for the first fortnight of the engagement. The Press Club's annual benefit entertainment, on December fifteenth, at Fischer's, will be an event of considerable importance. The program will be an exceptional one, comprising, in addition to the regular play, features gotten up expressly by the brightest members of the club.

A Nervy Heroine

When Alexy, the Siberian guide and hunter of the "Under the Polar Star" cast, made his entrance at the Central Tuesday night, the audience in general thought he was a real sure-enough Indian of the Far North, one of the outfit that is on its way to the St. Louis Exposition. It took some little time to persuade them that Alexy was not a genuine Siberian, but only Ernest Howell in disguise. This is one of the best parts Mr. Howell has had in the way of distinctive character, and he draws it with lifelike lines. He has all the strong situations, and he makes much of them. "Under the Polar Star" runs more to scenery than to dialogue, and the scenic artist deserves the major portion of applause. There's one scene where the aurora borealis appears, and another where an iceberg breaks up after drifting across the Pole. The iceberg is a triumph of scenic art. Mayall has the usual hero's part and Shumer is the villain, but he is not so villainous as usual. His part is more mildly sketched than those in which he has formerly appeared. Miss Lawton, the heroine, has one thrilling scene where, blinded and helpless, she crawls up an icy gangplank to rescue Mayall and Howell—Dr. Carleton and Alexy—who, in fetters, are awaiting a horrible death by fire. It is a sensational instant, and Miss Lawton certainly earns thrice her salary in surmounting its difficulties. I doubt if Barney Oldfield's wonderful automobile feat at Ingleside required more nerve.

Tyndall's Marvelous Psychic Powers

Those who witnessed the demonstrations of thought-transference at Dr. Alex. J. Melvor-Tyndall's lecture last Sunday night marveled at the ease and alacrity with which the thought-reader performed the most difficult feats in thought perception. Names, numbers, words, existent only in the minds of the audience or the committee selected, were accurately and almost instantly received by the telepathist. These experiments, while not as amusing as some of the others, are extremely convincing and of immense scientific value in proving the theory held by Tyndall, that thought has force and power similar to electricity. Tomorrow night Tyndall will talk on "Thought-transference and Telepathy," explaining the distinction between the two, and giving directions for the cultivation of both phases of psychic power. The lecture will be illustrated by further experiments in the power of thought. Tyndall expects to close his engagements here shortly before Christmas. On Sunday evening, November twenty-ninth, he will talk on "The Law of Harmony."

A production in German of Blumenthal and Kadelburg's comedy, "Im Weissen Roessel" is promised for the evening of Sunday, November twenty-ninth, at the Columbia. The presentation will be in the hands of Alameda's Lustspiel Ensemble, a group of amateur players. The cast will include some of the best known German players in California.

Jean Logan's "Dance of Judith" at the Episcopal Doll Fete last week was a beautiful and novel pas seul. It was full of grace and color. Miss Logan designs her own dances, and some of them are decidedly unique.

William Lamp, formerly of the Alcazar stock, comes with the special company to appear in "Way Down East," at the Columbia. Lamp plays the part of the villain in the drama.

Lulu Glazer in "Dolly Varden" and Clara Bloodgood in "The Girl with the Green Eyes," also Langtry, are prospective Columbia futures.

A Crowd on Grant Avenue

It is an old saying that "Nothing succeeds like success," and R. D. Davis has it in plenty. His firm has taken a lease on the adjoining store in Geary street, also McDonnell's drug-store in Grant avenue, which he occupied for sixteen years. They have also a lease on the entire building beginning about the first of the year. The premises of four neighbors absorbed into his own in four years is R. D. Davis's record thus far—one store annexed each year. He seems to be beating even John Bull's record for annexation, and one hears it whispered among the anxious store-keepers in the neighborhood, "Whom is he going to take next?" R. D. Davis & Co. have now as complete a Ladies' "Style" store as is to be found in the West. "Standing room" has been at a premium at the new show windows at Geary street and Grant avenue all the week. There was good excuse for the gathering, for nothing so handsome as the design and the furniture of the new windows has ever been seen in San Francisco. One has seen many windows remodeled, but the verdict in this competition seems to be that the genial R. D. Davis wins. The motto of the firm, "Our aim, the best," ought to be blazoned on these windows. Viewed in the evening, brilliantly lighted, they looked not unlike a peep at a fashionable night in a theatre. If Mr. Davis keeps on in this way the Treatre Trust will be down on him for running a rival show without a license. Once or twice it really looked as though the police would have to take some steps to keep the crowd "moving on." All who know Mr. R. D. Davis will wish him abundant and continued success.

Livorno's Popularity

In the few short weeks that Madame Livorno has been in San Francisco she has fully justified all that has been said and written about her in the different countries she has visited. Her palmistry delineations are marvelous indeed, and it is becoming quite the proper thing to have one's hand read by this "Queen of Chiromants," as a Paris paper very appropriately terms her. Since she moved from the California hotel to her apartments in Kearny street, over Hammersmith and Field's, she has been kept busy night and day; and as her fame spreads her clients become more numerous. She has been consulted by some very prominent San Franciscans, and one lady, who met her in London a couple of years ago, was pleasurably surprised to renew acquaintance in this far Western town. Livorno's personality is exceedingly magnetic and sympathetic, and after a short conversation with her one can quite understand how it is that her client speedily becomes her friend.

Eugene Cowles is a member of the Fritzi-Scheff comic opera company, also Josephine Bartlett, the old Bostonian stand-by. The opera is called "Babette" and it was tried on the dog in Washington, D. C. last week, opening at the Broadway, New York, on Monday of this week. The plot is laid in the time of the Spanish-Netherlands war, and the costumes are of the Louis XIV period. The first two acts show the chorus in fetching peasant costumes, and the last in court dress. A minuet is danced in this act. The chorus contains some stunning looking girls. One of them was understudy for Jessie Bartlett Davis with the Bostonians for two seasons. A San Francisco girl is in the chorus, Eliza Oldfield, who started her stage career in Nance O'Neil's company.

Features of Next Week's Bills

Annie Abbott, the "Little Georgia Magnet," will began a limited engagement at the Orpheum. She is possessed of some remarkable powers of animal magnetism and weighs but one hundred and ten pounds, but performs many feats that are the amazement of scientists. She does not assume to exert any physical force, either of resistance or pressure, yet ten men by their combined efforts are unable to lift her from the floor or to push her from a position which she assumes on the stage, while she, on her part, is able to lift a heavy man against the resisting force of ten men who try to hold down the support on which he sits. She will undoubtedly create a sensation here. The Armenis-Tito Quartet, imported direct from Europe by the Orpheum Circuit Company, will make their first appearance in America. Lovers of genuine minstrelsy will be regaled by Bryant and Saville. Searl and Violet Allen will also be new, presenting their laughable absurdity, "The Sign Painter." Wright Huntington will present his greatest success, "A Stolen Kiss." This week the Thursday matinees begin, making four afternoon performances every seven days—Wednesday, Thursday, Saturday and Sunday.

"Ben Hur" will be at the Grand but one more week. There is scarcely a seat to be had for the closing performances, and it could easily draw another month.

"Iris" will have another week at the Columbia, "Way Down East" to follow.

"Rubes and Roses" still goes at Fischer's but seats for "I. O. U." are now on sale.

"A Poor Relation," which E. E. Kidder wrote for Sol Smith Russell and in which the latter scored one of his greatest successes, will be given for the first time at popular prices, by the Alcazar company. James Durkin will personate Noah Vale, the starving inventor; Adele Block will be the generous society belle; Frances Starr, the hoydenish "Scollops"; John B. Maher, Marmaduke O'Haley, the Irish janitor, and George Osbourne the millionaire. Two clever little ones appear as Rip and Patch, the children of the tenements for whom the poor relation undergoes additional self-deprivation, and who are so scantily equipped that he has to put them in a barrel while he mends their ragged clothing. An extra matinee will be given on Thanksgiving day. The next attraction will be the first San Francisco production of the romantic comedy, "A Royal Prisoner."

At the Central will be "Midnight in Chinatown," a play full of color and replete with humorous incidents as well as sensational situations. The plot starts with a mysterious robbery and murder at the Bonanza mine, and the solution of the mystery furnishes the chief motive for the balance of the play. "Midnight in Chinatown" is just the kind of melodrama to keep an audience keyed up to the highest pitch of excitement for several acts.

At the Chutes will be Charles Carberry and Pearl Stanton, rural sketch artists, in "The Two Country Kids," and little Helene will also be new. Marsh and Sartolla will change their refined songs and dances, John Rossley and Marie Rostelle will continue "A Widow's Courtship" and the Volkyras will vary their gymnastic and hand balancing act. Mabel Lamson, the popular contralto, will be heard in new illustrated songs.

In Meditation

Though all else fade yet may I always keep
The memory of yesterday; that time
When words were said that made the pulses leap
And good was killed and evil set a-chime,
And every impulse that was virtue-fed
Lay prone. 'Twas then I hid the wound from which hope bled,
And made no outward sign when it was dead.

But I've remembered. 'Twixt my God and me
There lives a prayer, a fervid, earnest prayer,
That reaches down through all infinity
And rests where lesser pleas would fear to dare.
When He shall give His ultimate decree,
What will we do, my soul, when He shall say to me,
"This day I give to thee thine enemy."

November, 1903. MABEL PORTER PITTS.

A Problem Dialogue

"I have read," she remarked just as the cafe noir was brought in, "that under the empire of passion even the best hearts become in turn victims and torturers, and that passion once spent, they return to their better selves."

"Perhaps," he said, "but then I believe that sin has a chastening effect."

"I have heard so, too," she said, "but I have read that it is vain to beat against the barriers of the social law. People will talk, you know. By the way, do you think it is better to be sinned against than sinning?"

"I never had the opportunity to judge. I've been a sinner all my life, and I never really knew when I was being sinned against."

"Well, tell me candidly, do you think the game is worth the candle?"

"It all depends, my dear, on the quality of the candle."

"You equivocate."

"Not intentionally. The only game that ever I feel sure about is the one in which I lose more than I can afford."

"Do you think a woman can afford to lose the esteem of her friends?"

"Yes, of most friends, because it is not worth having."

"Have you ever heard that time dulls all sorrows except the remorse of the conscience-stricken?"

"I've heard something like that before. But a stricken conscience doesn't always superinduce remorse. It depends on how seriously the conscience has been seared."

"But when a woman sacrifices, through passion, the most priceless of the gems in nature's diadem, does she not suffer remorse when she returns to her better self?"

"If you were a lawyer you wouldn't ask that question."

"Why?"

"Because, being a man, I cannot testify as an expert regarding a matter that exclusively concerns your sex. However, I might suggest that if we always calculated upon the remorse that was likely to follow what we were inclined to do, our cowardice would keep us in perpetual misery."

"But the world would be more virtuous."

"And the churches would have to go out of business."

"You wouldn't miss them."

"I think you regard me as hopelessly unregenerate."

"Don't be afraid, I didn't come to a private room in a French restaurant to begin the work of your salvation."

"Well, will you please tell me why did you come?"

"Curiosity impelled me. I've heard a great deal about these dinners a deux, and I thought I should like to see what they are like."

"Disappointed?"

"Indeed I am not; the chef is an artist, and you know I'm something of an epicure."

"So you only came to eat."

"And talk. I've heard that you were an interesting controversialist, and a good pleader—being a lawyer."

"Did you suppose I came here to argue a cause?"

"Yes. I thought you were presenting a case just before the black coffee. At any rate your manner was quite impassioned."

"Was my argument convincing?"

The waiter didn't catch her answer, but he took the tip—a generous one. —The Riddler.

A Plea for the Old Songs

The illustrated song still lingers in vaudeville, and I have no doubt that the most popular number on the Chutes bill is still Miss Lamson's exposition of song, with pictures thrown on the sheet. Miss Lamson has been at the Chutes for some weeks, and her stunt shows no signs of boring the patrons. She is not an artistic singer, her voice being the kind that one hears in London music-halls. It is chiefly valuable for its far-reaching quality, and the fact that she pronounces the words so that not even those in the far end of the gallery can fail to understand their significance. The songs, however, are not of any value either in words or music. They serve to explain the pictures thrown on the screen, and that is all. Yet there are songs of artistic value that could be used in this way, old songs that were favorites thirty years ago and would be novelties to this generation. There is one I recall beginning "As I rummaged through the attic, listening to the falling rain," which offers itself readily to illustration. Its stanzas give reminiscences of by-gone days, inspired by objects found in the old attic. Then there is that old song "Learning to Walk," and, as soldier ditties are still reigning favorites, the ballad about the officer, the golden-haired sweetheart and the knot of blue-ribbon which used to be warbled in smart drawing-rooms two decades ago. If an illustrated-song-exponent would take the trouble to root out some of these old ballads it would repay her time. "The Jockey Hat and Feather" and "The Captain" who "took a sly glance at me," that Mrs. Florence used to sing, and Sol Smith Russell's schoolgirl ditty about "They locked me in an upper room and took away the key" are among them.

The Briggs Recital

The recital of Mrs. Wallace Wheaton Briggs on Thursday evening last filled Century hall with an audience of music-lovers. Mrs. Briggs is the possessor of a large, warm, although somewhat uneven mezzo-soprano. Her opening number was a group of Elgar's "Sea Pictures," in the first of which, "The Swimmer,"she achieved a distinct success. This selection presents immense difficulties to the singer, and Mrs. Briggs could well have rested on her laurels. But the program called for two more of the "Sea Pictures," and after the effort of the first her voice showed signs of fatigue. She was quite restored, however, by the end of Mr. Friedhofer's number, and presented the aria and recitative from Tschaikowsky's "Joan of Arc" in fine style. This was on the whole her best number and its broad, dramatic style was well suited to her. Dr. Stewart's "California Night Song" went off well, Mr. Friedhofer playing the 'cello obligato. This piece ought to become a favorite. The words are by Homer Henley. The song was written especially for Mrs. Briggs and dedicated to her. The Arthur Foote group of songs was well rendered. Child verses and slumber songs are a fad of the hour, and every singer feels called upon to present a few of them whether they suit her style or not. Mrs. Briggs did not sing to advantage in her three selections. She was much better in "Die Bekehrte" by Max Stange, which she gave in response to a recall. Dr. Stewart accompanied throughout and Mr. Friedhofer was a delight, as always, on the 'cello, particularly so in the Andante and Finale of the Goltermann Concerto in A minor, played without notes.

third, in Maple hall. It is a long time since Mr. Bogart, who the critics have ever termed our best baritone singer, has appeared in concert here. During his absence in London and New York he has added to his repertory of songs, and his recital will be one of the most interesting events of the year. The program will include songs of the seventeenth century, "The Happy Lover," "Lacia li dir" and "Drinking Song"; four by Robert Schumann and songs by Clifford Page, John W. Metcalf, G. W. Chadwick and R. Huntington Woodman.

A New Tenor in Town

A new solo tenor has come to town, and his advent is certainly welcome. We need good tenors in San Francisco, for they are exceedingly rare here. Indeed, I doubt if we have more than two or three really good tenors here. Charles Hildesley is the new arrival's name. He is straight from London, where he sang in St. Andrew's church, Well street, and The Temple, Fleet street. He was a choir boy at St. Andrew's, under the late St. Joseph Barnby. He studied under Shakespeare, who was Mr. H. B. Pasmore's teacher when he was in London, Randegger and Sir Arthur Sullivan. He also sang in opera in D'Oyly Carte's company at the Savoy, and in other organizations. If Mr. Hildesley concludes to stay in San Francisco he will probably open a school of voice and opera.

At the piano recital given by Mr. Van Yorx last Saturday afternoon the pianist was assisted by Miss Daisy Cohn, the soprano of Temple Emanu-El. Miss Cohn sang Chaminade's "L'Ete," and the runs, trills and staccato measures were executed with wonderful ease and finish. Her second number was Denza's "May Morning" which was likewise rendered in a charming manner.

The annual fall exhibition is now open at the Hopkins Institute, and the regular musicales will be given next Wednesday and the following Thursday evenings, the programs under Henry Heyman's direction. At the members' reception on Thursday night the compositions rendered were by Mayor Schmitz and Arthur Johannsen of our city, Thomas, Bendix, Strauss, Puccini, Arnold, Mascheroni, Osborne, Englander, Waldteufel and Mills.

Automobile Topics

The recent automobile meet in this city gave great impetus to the trade, and stimulated interest in the horseless carriage to a degree that even the most enthusiastic promoters could scarcely have anticipated. The auto fever is infectious, and it is hard to escape it after one has had the experience of a ride. To get an approximate idea of the growth of the automobile habit, take an afternoon off, and stand at the corner of Golden Gate and Van Ness avenues, and watch the machines whirl by. Among other things, the races at Ingleside stimulated rivalry among the representatives of the various auto factories, and one hears a great deal these days about the respective merits of the various brands.

The following communication is self-explanatory:

300 Post St., San Francisco, Cal., Nov. 13, 1903.

Gentlemen,

Replying to a challenge published in your current issue, signed by the National Automobile Company, and directed at us, as we are specifically mentioned in the same, we beg to reply that we will accept the said challenge and compete a regular stock Model $2,150.00 "White" touring car, against a regular stock Model $2,150.00 Toledo. Their Toledo car, for which they ask $4,650.00, is not even as good as the "White," as we defeated it in the late races with two "Whites" which sell at less than half the price; and we will deposit $500.00 against their $500.00—the losers' money to go to the Automobile Club of California, the winners' money to be returned to them—that they cannot on the Ingleside track, with their $4,650.00 Toledo, specially geared as it is and stripped of everything except the frame, equal the record of 1:9 4-5 seconds for one mile, 2:19 3-5 seconds for two miles, and 6:04 2-5 seconds for five miles, the American record for American made stock touring cars, regardless of price, made by a regular stock $2,150.00 "White" touring car, on Ingleside track, when we defeated Barney Oldfield on November sixth. We reserve the right to have a timer and a representative present at the trial against that record, the timers to be officials of the Automobile Club of California.

It may seem like presumption to insist that we sell a superior car for $2,150.00 to that sold by them at $4,650.00, but we do so insist, and are ready to back up the assertion with $500.00 to the Automobile Club, of California under the conditions above named.

Yours very truly,

WHITE SEWING MACHINE COMPANY,
per C. A. Hawkins, Manager.

The Pioneer Automobile Company is in receipt of congratulatory letters from the Olds Motor Works on the good work done by the Oldsmobile at the Ingleside races. While this machine has done some very fast work in Los Angeles and throughout the East, the Ingleside races are the first real work done in and around San Francisco. The Oldsmobile easily defeated the Rambler and Buckboard and, by time, the Cadillac, Franklin, St. Louis, Rambler and Orient Buckboard. Barney Oldfield, with his Winton Bullet No. 2, made a mile in one minute and two-fifths of a second at San Jose on Sunday, November fifteenth. Two thousand people were there and Mr. Oldfield said it was one of the most enthusiastic crowds in whose presence he has ever raced. The track was in bad condition and, on account of its narrowness, is not an Oldfield track by any means. However, Barney, who is known for giving the public the best he can wherever he races, succeeding in running off a mile in one minute and two-fifths of a second.

Mr. A. E. Joyce of Watsonville, California, is the proud possessor of a Winton touring car which he purchased from the Pioneer Automobile Company on Thursday of last week, and, in company with Mr. C. C. Eib of the Pioneer Automobile Company, drove the machine through from San Francisco to Watsonville.

At the races at San Jose on Sunday, Dr. E. C. Bangs was in evidence with his Stevens-Duryea automobile. Dr. Bangs recently made a trip of eighteen hundred miles through Northern California and his fare bill for the entire trip was ten cents. This simply illustrates the possibilities of the automobile if given the proper attention and driven by a careful person.

Another car load of Oldsmobiles arrived at the Pioneer Automobile Company's garage last Thursday and as usual everybody in the place is kept busy getting the machines ready for delivery. This makes the sixteenth car load of Oldsmobiles sold in San Francisco this season.
